Unto the elders of Midian.] Who were their neighbours and confederates. The title of elders, it appears by this, was given in other nations, as well as among the Israelites, to the greatest persons in their countries: or the Israelites, after their manner, so called men every where, who were in high authority. For these persons who are here called elders, are called kings, chap. xxxi. 8. and princes, Josh. xiii. 21. In like manner they, who in the seventh verse of this chapter are called the elders of Moab, are in the next verse called the princes of Moab. Which, it is evident, was the ancient language among the Egyptians (Gen. l. 7. unless we suppose Moses, as I said, to have spoken in the language of the Jews), and, it is very likely, was also the ancient language of Phœnicia, and the countries thereabouts; and perhaps in much remoter parts. For it is a known story, that when the Phœnicians fled before Joshua, and forsook the land of Canaan, they fixed in Afric; where they left this name of elders among the Carthaginians. (See Mr. Selden, lib. i. de Synedr. cap. 14. p. 587, &c.)

Midian.] This is not the country wherein Jethro was a prince; for that was not far from Mount Sinai, as appears from Exod. iii. 1. whereas this was remote from that place, adjoining to the Moabites, and near to Palestine: though it is very probable the people of both these countries were descended from Abraham, by one of the sons he had by Keturah, (Gen. xxv. 2.)

Now shall this company.] The army of Israel encamped in the plains of Moab, (ver. 1.)

Lick up all round about us.] i. e. Devour us and all our neighbours (or our whole country), unless we join together to oppose them.

As the ox licketh up the grass of the field.] They use this metaphor, to signify how easily the Israelites would conquer them, without a timely, resolute, and unanimous opposition; and likewise what an universal desolation they would make. For the words are in the Hebrew, the green of the field, i. e. not only the grass, but the leaves of trees, which oxen eat, as Bochartus observes out of the Scripture, as well as other authors, (Isa. xxvii. 20.) And to lick up is not lightly to touch with their tongue, but to eat and consume. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 31.)

And Balak the son of Zippor was king of the Moabites at that time.] He was mentioned before, ver. 8. but here recorded to have been king of the country; who endeavoured to secure himself, by the assistance of his neighbours and allies; unto whom he sent this embassy, to advise with them what course it was best for them to take for their common safety.

Ver. 5. He sent messengers therefore.] The result of the treaty with Midian was, that with joint consent they should send ambassadors, of each nation, and of the same quality, on the following message, ver. 7. And this counsel, it is likely, was given by the Midianites; for Balak saith nothing of it by his messengers: but it was resolved on when they came there, as the most effectual means for their security. This, I think, the word therefore imports.

Unto Balaam.] A famous soothsayer, or diviner, as he is called in Josh. xiii. 22. That is, one who pretended to foretell future things, and discover secrets, &c. though not by good and allowable arts, but such as were absolutely prohibited to God's people, (Deut. xviii. 10.) He had been formerly a good man, and a true prophet, till, loving the wages of unrighteousness, he apostatized from God, and became a kosem, which we translate a diviner: that is (saith Aben Ezra) an astrologer; who, observing when men were under a bad aspect of the stars, pronounced a curse upon them; which sometimes coming to pass, gained him a great reputation. But this is not the import of that word, as I shall shew in its proper place. Let it suffice now to observe, that the Jews are so much of this opinion, that he had been a better man than he was now, that they take him, as St. Jerome observes, to be the same person who, in the book of Job, is called Elihu. But Origen and some others think he was no prophet, but only one of the devil's sorcerers, of whom he went to inquire; but God was pleased to put the devil by, and give what answer he thought fit: which Balaam himself plainly discerned, and therefore calls himself, "He who heard the words of God," &c. On which side the truth lies, we shall be able to judge, when we come to consider what passed between God and him, in the following history.

The son of Beor.] Who was also called Bosor, as some gather from 2 Pet. ii. 15. though that place may have another interpretation.

To Pethor.] A city in Aram, or Mesopotamia, (chap. xxiii. 7. Deut. xxiii. 4.) This was the ancient name of the place; which in aftertimes the Syrians called Bosor, by an easy change of two letters, which is very usual. So Grotius understands those words, (2 Pet. ii. 15.) Βαλαὰμ τοῦ Βοσὸρ, Balaam (not the son, but) of the city of Bosor.

Which is by the river of the land of the children of his people.] i. e. Near to Euphrates; which is commonly in these books called by the name of the river, (Gen. xv. 18. and many other places.) This determines Aram (which was the name of several countries thereabouts) to signify that which is called in Scripture Aram Naharaim; that is, the Aram which lay between the two famous rivers of Euphrates and Tygris. The former of which was called, by way of eminence, the river (though the other also was eminent), because it was nearest and best known to the Israelites. And Ptolemy mentions a city called Pachoria in his time, upon this river, which some take to be Pethor. And it is very probable that Abraham, before he came into Canaan, lived hereabout, (Gen. xxiv. 4. 10. Josh. xxiv. 2.) And here Jacob also served for his wife, and begat all the patriarchs, except Benjamin, (whence the Israelites acknowledged their father to have been a poor Aramite, or Syrian, as we translate it, Deut. xxvi. 5.) by which means some relics of true religion still remained in this country, though mixed with a great deal of superstition.

To call him.] To invite him to come to them.

Saying, There is a people come out of Egypt.] Which all the power of Pharaoh could not hinder.

They cover the face of the earth.] Are exceeding numerous.

And they abide over against me.] Lie encamped not far from me, and are ready to invade my country.

Ver. 6. Come now therefore, I pray thee.] They were to speak in the name of the king of Moab, (whose words these are said to be, ver. 7.) there being no king, perhaps, at this time in Midian, but several little princes, who are called kings, (chap. xxxi. 8.)

And curse me this people.] It seems they had an opinion in those days, which prevailed much in aftertimes, that some men had a power, by the help of their gods, to blast not only particular persons, but whole armies; so that they should not be able to effect their designs. This they are said to have done, sometimes only by bare words of imprecation; of which there was a set form among some people, which Æschines calls διοριζομένην ἀρὰν, the determinate curse. Sometimes they also offered sacrifices, and used certain rites and ceremonies, with solemn charms; a famous instance of which we find in the life of Crassus; where Plutarch tells us, that Atteius, tribune of the people, made a fire at the gate, out of which Crassus was to march unto the war against the Parthians: into which he threw certain things to make a fume, and offered sacrifices to the most angry gods, with horrid imprecations upon him; which, he saith, according to ancient tradition, had such a power, that no man, who was loaded with them, could avoid being undone.

For they are too mighty for me.] I am not able to deal with them without thy help.

Peradventure.] But I hope, &c. For the Hebrew word אולי is not a particle of doubting, but of hoping: "Non est particula dubitantis, sed bene ominantis et sperantis;" as Forsterus observes, (Isa. xxxvii. 4. Zephan. ii. 3.)

I shall prevail, that I may smite them, and that I may drive them out of the land.] I hope, by the conjunction of thy curses with my sword, I may be able to destroy them; or at least to drive them out of this country.

For I wot that he whom thou blessest is blessed, and he whom thou cursest is cursed.] The ancient prophets had such power with God to obtain great blessings from him, for others, as appears by the story of Abraham and Abimelech, (Gen. xx. 10.) and of Jacob, who blessed Pharaoh, (Gen. xlvii. 7.) and afterward all his own sons. And no doubt their imprecations were as powerful, when there was a just cause for them; according to what we read, 2 Kings ii. 24. And it is likely, while Balaam (who was a prophet, as appears by what follows, and is so called by St. Peter), continued a good man, he blessed and cursed no other way, but by prayer to God, and by imprecations in his name: which was imitated by other great men, particularly by king Cambyses in his speech to the Persians, recorded by Herodotus, in Thalia, cap. 65. where he saith, "If you do what I require, then let your land bring forth plentifully; and your wives and your flocks be fruitful, and yourselves enjoy your liberty: but if ye do not, τὰ ἐναντία τούτοισι ἀρέομαι ὑμῖν γενέσθαι, I imprecate the quite contrary things to these to fall upon you." But when Balaam degenerated into a false prophet, and became a diviner, then he used spells and enchantments (as is plain by this history), and such rites and ceremonies as were the invention of wicked spirits; which Pharaoh's magicians, the Jews fancy, made use of to stop the Israelites at the Red Sea; (see Exod. xiv. 2.)

Ver. 7. And the elders of Moab, and the elders of Midian.] I take these two nations to have been ancient confederates; but the Jewish tradition is, that they had been always at enmity, and now reconciled by a common danger; just as two mastiffs (so they explain it), who are continually fighting, when they see the wolf set upon one of them, join together for their defence; because, if he devour the one, the other will not long survive him.

Departed with the rewards of divination in their hand.] It was the custom among God's people, when they came to consult with a prophet, to bring him a present; as appears from 1 Sam. ix. 7, 8. And indeed, from ancient time, men were not wont to approach great persons without one: (see Gen. xliii. 11. 25, 26.)

And they came unto Balaam, and spake unto him the words of Balak.] Delivered their message; having first, as the manner was, made him the present.

Ver. 8. And he said unto them, Lodge with me this night.] That was the time, it seems, wherein he was wont to receive answers to his inquiries; either in a dream, or by apparitions, or some other way. There are those who think he now began to betray the naughtiness of his heart, in taking time to advise about this matter; which, if he had been a faithful servant of God, he would instantly have rejected with disdain. And it is likely enough, by what follows, that he was as desirous of their money, as they were of his imprecations.

And I will bring you word again, as the Lord shall speak unto me.] You shall have my answer, according to the directions which the Lord shall give me. By this I take it to be evident, that he was not a stranger to the true God, with whose name it is certain he was acquainted; and, it is probable, had received revelations from him, till he became a covetous mercenary prophet, and addicted himself to superstitious rites and ceremonies; making use of teraphim, perhaps, which had been of ancient practice in his country, and worshipping God, perhaps, by other images. See Gen. xxxi. 19. 24. 30. 49. where it is evident that Laban had still communication with the Lord, though he used teraphim, and calls them his gods. Which perhaps put that idle conceit into the head of some of the Jews, that it was one and the same person, who is there called Laban, and here Balaam: who falling, as I said, into idolatrous practices, was forsaken by God, and delivered up to the impostures of evil spirits; though he still continued to inquire of the Lord, who was pleased, at this time, to make his mind known to him, for the preservation of his people Israel.

And the princes of Moab abode with Balaam.] As did those of Midian also; who are mentioned in the foregoing verse. Though some of the Jews have a fancy, that the elders of Midian went away (which they give as the reason that they are not here mentioned) as soon as they heard Balaam say, he would address himself for advice unto the Lord; who they knew would be favourable to Israel. And on the other side, some Christians have been of opinion, that he addressed himself to the Lord, only to try if he could draw him by his charms to take part with the Moabites: just as the Romans, when they laid siege to a city, endeavoured, by all means they could invent, to persuade the tutelar gods of that place to forsake it, and come over to their side: which rite is described by Macrobius.

Ver. 9. And God came unto Balaam.] As he is said to have done unto Abimelech in a dream, Gen. xx. 3. where I observed that Maimonides makes a distinction between God's coming to a person, and his speaking to him: but that cannot be made use of here; for God did both come and speak to Balaam, as appears from ver. 32. 35. where we read, the angel of the Lord spake to him. And here it will be fit to note, that all nations, of whom we have any knowledge, have been possessed with this opinion, that God was wont to appear frequently unto men; especially, cum recentes à Deo essent, (as Seneca speaks in Epist. xc.) when they were newly come out of his hand: and that he also was pleased to reveal his mind and will unto them, by some means or other; particularly by his angels, whom he sent on messages to them, as long as there was any goodness left among them. This is most admirably expressed by Catullus:

> "Præsentes namque ante domos invisere castas
> Sæpius, et sese mortali ostendere cœtu
> Cœlicolæ, nondum spreta pietate, solebant."

See Huetius in his Quæstiones Alnetanæ. lib. ii. cap. 12. n. 1, 2. And indeed no account can be given, how it came into the head of Homer, and other poets, to bring in the gods appearing so oft as they do, upon every occasion, if God had not been wont, in ancient time, to manifest himself, not only to the Israelites, but to other nations also, especially before the distinction of this people from them. So he did to Abimelech, Laban, &c. as well as to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. For, as Dr. Jackson hath well observed, (in his first book upon the Creed, chap. 11.) if they had never heard nor read of any such thing, all the wits in the world, had they beat their brains never so much, could not have thought of bringing the gods in a visible shape upon the stage, or interlacing their poems with their frequent apparitions: nor can any other account be given, how this came to be the common belief of the world, from one end of it to the other, that the gods revealed their mind to men; the philosophers, as well as ordinary people, in the east, west, north, and south, making no doubt of it: for Abaris Hyperboreus, and Zamolxis Geta, were no less famous in the north, than the Egyptian prophets were in the south.

But when mankind degenerated, and corrupted themselves by all manner of wickedness, then God forsook them, and permitted evil angels to take the place of the good, and plunge mankind further into all manner of filthiness; especially into abominable idolatries. So that Balaam, who, I question not, had at first familiarity with God and his holy angels, abusing this honour God had done him, in making him a prophet, by employing it to serve his vile covetousness, God gave him up to the delusion of evil spirits; of whom he learnt enchantments. But at this time God was pleased again to appear to him himself, for the good of his people Israel, and to overrule all his bad inclinations: insomuch that Moses says at last he did not go, as he had done, to seek enchantments, (chap. xxiv. 1.) but gave up himself wholly, for the present, to the conduct of God's Spirit; as I shall there observe.

And said unto him.] By an angel, as Maimonides interprets it, (More Nevoch. par. ii. cap. 41.)

What men are these with thee?] He asks this question, partly to prove Balaam, whether he would tell him the truth of their business; and partly to make way for the following direction.

Ver. 10. And Balaam said unto God.] To whom (it appears by this) and to the way wherein God communicated himself, he was not a stranger.

Balak the son of Zippor, king of Moab, hath sent unto me, saying.] This shews the embassy was sent principally in his name; the Midianites only joined in it, (ver. 5.)

Ver. 11. Behold, there is a people come out of Egypt, &c.] This verse contains only a brief report of the message that was sent him; to which he desired God would tell him what answer he should return.

Ver. 12. And God said unto Balaam.] By an angel, (ver. 9. and ver. 35.)

Thou shalt not go with them, thou shalt not curse this people: for they are blessed.] He not only forbids him to comply with Balak's desire, but gives him such a reason as was likely to prevail with him, if his prohibition was not sufficient; that it was impossible, with all his enchantments, to reverse the blessing which God had bestowed upon this people.

Ver. 13. And Balaam rose up in the morning, and said to the princes of Balak, Get ye to your own land.] He seems resolved to obey God, rather than comply with them; and therefore dispatched them, as soon as he could, with the following answer.

For the Lord refuseth to give me leave to go with you.] He acquaints them only with half of God's answer; for he omits the reason, which was the principal thing: though it may be thought to be implied; that if the Lord, on whose pleasure he pretended to depend, refused to let him go, it was in vain to attempt to curse them.

Ver. 14. And the princes of Moab rose up.] They did not stand to dispute the matter with him, or to importune him; which shews that he had given them a peremptory denial.

And they went unto Balak, and said, Balaam refuseth to come with us.] They report his answer as imperfectly as he did God's; saying not a word, that the Lord refused to let him come. They were loath, perhaps (as the manner of such persons is), to deliver unwelcome news to their master.

Ver. 15. And Balak sent yet again princes, more, and more honourable than they.] He being ignorant of the true cause of his refusal, imagined that Balaam thought himself slighted; and expected a greater number of persons, and of greater quality, should have been sent to him. For prophets, in ancient time, were men highly esteemed; as not only sacred persons, but who had a great interest in God; of whom they could obtain whatsoever they desired. God himself thought this sufficient to keep Abimelech from injuring Abraham, to acquaint him that he was a prophet, (Gen. xx. 3.) And therefore they were called men of God; being thought, by the very gentiles, to be full of some Numen or other; whereby they became interpreters of the gods (as they called them), who ministered ἐν μέσῳ θεῶν καὶ ἀνθρώπων, between the gods and men: insomuch that women, when they became prophetesses, had very great authority; as we find in Deborah, who calls herself a mother in Israel: (Judges v. 7.) and therefore all such persons were under the special protection of Heaven, (Psal. cv. 15.)

Ver. 16. And they came unto Balaam, and said, Thus saith Balak the son of Zippor.] They seem to speak of their master in a higher style than the former ambassadors did, ver. 7. where it is only said, "they spake unto him the words of Balak."

Let nothing, I pray thee, hinder thee from coming to me.] Yet they submissively beseech him, in their master's name, not to suffer any thing to keep him from coming to him; for he thought, perhaps, that Balaam might be detained by other more profitable employments.

Ver. 17. For I will promote thee to very great honour.] He imagined, it is probable, that Balaam looked upon the rewards of divination, which he sent him, as not sufficient encouragement; and therefore he promises him to advance him to some high preferment in his court.

And I will do whatsoever thou sayest unto me.] And moreover, he promises to bestow an estate, as great as he would desire, to support his new dignity.

Come therefore, I pray thee.] They add importunity to their earnest request.

Curse me this people.] Having heard (as David Chytræus understands this) that the Israelites conquered their opposers by prayers, rather than by arms (as they had done Pharaoh and the Amalekites), the king of Moab thought he might prevail against them by the same means.

Ver. 18. And Balaam answered and said to the servants of Balak.] To the messengers whom he had sent, who, it appears by this, were principal officers in his court, (ver. 15.) For the servants of Pharaoh are called the elders of his house, Gen. l. 7.

If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord my God, to do more or less.] This is not the language of one that was a stranger to the true God; for no prophet in Israel ever spake of him in more familiar terms than these, the Lord my God. And for the present, the command of God seems to have suppressed his covetous and ambitious desires, so that he durst not yield to them; though it appears, by what follows, he was strongly inclined to follow them.

Ver. 19. Now therefore, I pray you, tarry you also here this night.] Take a lodging with me, as your predecessors did, (ver. 8.)

That I may know what the Lord will say unto me now.] Whether the Lord will alter his mind, as he hoped he might; otherwise he would have rested in the first answer he received from God, and not tried again if he could prevail by his importunity to get leave to go; as these great promises of riches and honour made him desire.

Ver. 20. And God came unto Balaam at night.] Notwithstanding which, God was pleased again to visit him with his presence; at least by one of his angelic ministers.

And said unto him, If the men come to call thee.] Press thee again to comply with them.

Rise up, and go with them.] Since thou hast such a mind to go, follow thy inclinations. These words seem to be spoken angrily, though not sarcastically, as some would have them, like those 1 Kings xxii. 15.

But yet the word which I shall say unto thee, that shalt thou do.] Some take these words to be not so much a command as a prediction; that he should not be able to say a word but what he was ordered by God.

Ver. 21. And Balaam rose up in the morning, and saddled his ass.] Commanded his ass to be made ready; for he had servants to wait upon him, (ver. 22.) And great persons in those countries were wont to ride upon asses; of which we find examples before this, in Abraham, (Gen. xxii. 1.) and in Moses, (Exod. iv. 20.) and, in aftertimes, the judges of Israel were thus mounted, (Judges v. 10.) and their children, (chap. x. 4. xii. 14.)

And went with the princes of Moab.] They set out, perhaps, together; or he desired them to go a little before, and he would follow them. For it appears by the following part of this relation, that he did not make a part of their train; but travelled, at least some part of the way, with his two servants alone.

Ver. 22. And God's anger was kindled because he went.] This may seem strange, since he had a permission to go along with them: but the meaning is not, that God was displeased because he did as he was permitted; but because he went so readily (without offering to stay at home, as he had been commanded at first), and because he carried along with him an evil mind, desirous to get the money and the honour that was proffered him; and consequently with an inclination to curse Israel, and with hopes that he might, by some means or other, compass that wicked end. This is plainly signified by the angel's words, ver. 35. where he permits him still to go on, but with a caution not to attempt to speak a word otherwise than he bade him. This is more plainly evident from Deut. xxiii. 5.

And the angel of the Lord.] The same angel, which is thought to have spoken to him, ver. 12. 20.

Stood in the way.] In the very path wherein his ass was going.

For an adversary against him.] To stop his proceedings, that he might not go on in his sin, and perish, as R. Solomon glosses.

Now he was riding upon his ass, and his two servants were with him.] He was in his journey upon the road, but separated from the rest of the company; having only his own two servants with him, who waited on him.

Ver. 23. And the ass saw the angel of the Lord standing in the way.] The Lord, saith the same R. Solomon, let the ass see what his master could not, his mind been blinded by his converse with demons: or rather, God deprived him, for the present, of the power of seeing what stood just before him.

And his sword drawn in his hand.] Threatening to kill him if he went forward.

And the ass turned aside out of the way.] Out of the road wherein they were travelling.

And went into the field.] Which lay on the side of the highway.

And Balaam smote the ass to turn her into the way.] As the manner is still, when such creatures are unruly.

Ver. 24. And the angel of the Lord stood in the path of the vineyards.] It is uncertain whether the ass turned into the way again, or went on in the field, till they came to these vineyards.

A wall being on this side, and a wall on that side.] In a very narrow passage.

Ver. 25. And when the ass saw the angel of the Lord.] Which opposed him here again, as he had done in the broad highway.

She thrust herself unto the wall.] To avoid the angel.

And crushed Balaam's foot against the wall.] The angel and his drawn sword, which it is likely he brandished, took up so much of the way on both sides, that there was not room for the ass to pass without going too close to the wall.

And he smote her again.] Being very angry at her untowardness.

Ver. 26. And the angel of the Lord went further, and stood in a narrow place.] Through which Balaam was to pass.

Where there was no way to turn, either to the right hand or to the left.] Where the angel took up the whole passage, and left no space on either side for the ass to go.

Ver. 27. And when the ass saw the angel of the Lord.] And no way to avoid him.

She fell down under Balaam.] Being unable either to turn back, the way was so narrow, or to go forward, because the angel filled up all the passage.

And Balaam's anger was kindled, and he smote the ass with a staff.] Harder than he had done before.

Ver. 28. And the Lord.] By his angel, as Bochart interprets it.

Opened the mouth of the ass.] Which naturally is a dumb creature, having no organs of speech; but, by an extraordinary power of God, who made man's mouth, had her tongue so moved to the palate, teeth, and lips, and the air was so compressed within her mouth, as to form words as plain as we speak.

And she said unto Balaam.] That an ass should, by the power of God, be made to speak, one would think should not seem incredible to Christians, when heathens did not disbelieve such things, but received them as undoubted truths. Witness what they say of the ass upon which Bacchus rode, and the ram of Phryxus, and the horse of Achilles and Adrastus, and the bull of Europa, and the lamb in Egypt when Bocchoris reigned there, and the elephant of Porus in India; all which are reported to have spoken: and vast numbers of other instances are heaped up by two eminently-learned Frenchmen, Bochartus in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 14.; and Huetius, in his Alnetanæ Quæstiones, lib. ii. cap. 12. n. 26.; which things are alleged out of their books, not to prove all such stories to be true, but that they thought them true, and thought it did not exceed the power of their gods to effect such things. Nor could they except against the Bible, because of the strange things there reported, the like wonders being commonly believed among themselves; which, if they were devised by the gentile writers, it was, in all likelihood, out of this sacred history; that they might not seem to come behind the Jews in any thing which might give credit to their own religion.

If Maimonides had been acquainted with such things as these, he would not have said, that all this which happened to Balaam in the way to Balak, was done in a prophetical vision, (par. ii. More Nevochim, cap. 42.) which is the conceit of R. Levi ben Gersom also, who compares this with what we read, Hosea i. 3, &c. concerning the prophet's taking a wife of whoredoms, &c. and denies the literal sense, merely because he could not imagine how an ass should be made to speak: no, nor could he, or any man else, tell how such a representation could be made to the prophet's imagination in a vision, but by the power of God; to whom the one was as easy as the other.

What have I done unto thee, that thou hast smote me these three times?] There was some cause; for his foot was crushed, and he fell with her: but the ass could not help it.

Ver. 29. And Balaam said unto the ass.] One would have expected that he should have been astonished, and struck as dumb as the ass naturally was, to hear her speak so plain, and expostulate with him: but he was in a rage, or rather fury; so that for the present he did not consider any thing, but her untoward crossness. St. Peter observes so much, when he saith the dumb ass rebuked the madness of the prophet; where the word Παραφρονία is unusual in the Greek language, signifying that he was beside himself, not knowing what he said or did; partly out of anger, and partly because he was possessed with an eager desire and hope to serve Balak, and get the riches and honour he promised him, now that he had got leave of God to go to him.

Because thou hast mocked me.] Or, as the Arabic version, printed at Paris, translates it, thrown me in the dirt. But they seem to have read the word otherways than it is in the Hebrew; where it signifies either mocking, or exposing to scorn and laughter.

I would there were a sword in my hand, for now would I kill thee!] This shews the height of his rage, to be thus crossed in his designs; and, as the Jewish doctors take it, the height of his folly also; that he should pretend to be able to destroy the whole congregation of Israel with his enchantments, who needed a sword to kill a poor ass.

Ver. 30. And the ass said unto Balaam, Am not I thine ass?] This does not prove that the ass understood what Balaam said, and thereupon returned this pertinent answer; but that the same Power which made the ass speak at first, continued to form such an answer as might convince Balaam of his error.

Upon which thou hast ridden ever since I was thine unto this day?] The Hebrew words will not bear this sense; but are exactly rendered in the margin of our Bibles, ever since thou wast, that is, a rider; ever since thou began to ride, as Aben Ezra expounds it. Whence many render it, from thy youth; which may be supposed to be a long time; Balaam, in all likelihood, being now no young man, but for many years a famous prophet.

Was I ever wont to do so unto thee?] Hast thou not had sufficient experience, in so many years as I have served thee, of my sure going? As much as to say, Thou shouldst have thought some unwonted cause had forced me to do three times what I never did before.

And he said, Nay.] He could not but allow the truth of what was spoken by the ass.

Ver. 31. Then the Lord opened the eyes of Balaam.] He was not blind before; but his eyes were held as the eyes of the men of Sodom were, who could not see Lot's door, though they found their way to their own home, (Gen. xix. 1.)

And he saw the angel of the Lord standing in the way, and his sword drawn in his hand.] He understood the true cause of the ass's turning aside, and falling under him.

And he bowed down his head, and fell flat upon his face.] He first bowed his head, and then his whole body, in token of his most profound reverence.

Ver. 32. And the angel of the Lord said unto him, Wherefore hast thou smitten thy ass these three times?] This serves to teach us, saith Maimonides, not to use cruelty towards beasts, but to treat them gently and mercifully; (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 17.) or rather, as another of them makes the angel say to Balaam, If I am commanded to reprove thee for thy injustice to thy ass, how much more for thy wicked intention to destroy a whole nation? But the drift of this speech seems to be, to reprehend the brutish stupidity of the prophet, in not apprehending some extraordinary hand of God, which turned his ass aside so oft, and at last made her speak.

Behold, I went out to withstand thee.] I was the cause of thy ass's turning out of the way, and falling down, by my standing in the path to oppose thee, and stop thy proceedings, (ver. 22.)

Because thy way is perverse before me.] His intentions and purposes were not sincere and honest: for, pretending to obey God, he designed, if he could, to serve Balak. The word we translate perverse, signifies perplexed and intricate in the Arabian language: and so Bochartus thinks it should be translated here.

Ver. 33. And the ass saw me, and turned away from me these three times.] I was merciful unto thee, in letting the ass see me, which saved thy life, as it here follows.

Unless the ass had turned from me, surely now I had slain thee, and saved her alive.] It had cost thee thy life if the ass had gone forward, and thy life alone; for I would not have done any hurt to her.

Ver. 34. And Balaam said unto the angel of the Lord, I have sinned.] It is not certain that this refers to any sense he had of the perverse disposition of his heart; for it may have respect only to his outrageousness against his ass, which he confesses was without cause.

For I knew not that thou stoodest in the way against me.] Or rather, but I knew not, &c. for this seems to be said in excuse of himself, from his ignorance that the ass was turned out of the way by the angel.

Now therefore, if it displease thee, I will get me back again.] He would not understand the angel right, who did not find fault with his going to Balak, but with his going with such bad intentions.

Ver. 35. And the angel of the Lord said unto Balaam, Go with the men.] As God had before bidden him, (ver. 20.) and did not send the angel to forbid what he had allowed.

But the word that I shall speak unto thee, that thou shalt speak.] These words are something different from those in ver. 20. importing both that he should not presume to speak a word but what he ordered, and that he should not forbear to speak what he bade him.

And Balaam went with the princes of Balak.] Whom he overtook after this stop, either at the place where they lodged, or where they stayed for him; but he did not tell them what he met withal in the way.

Ver. 36. And when Balak heard that Balaam was come.] By some messenger sent before to acquaint him with his coming.

He went out to meet him.] Partly out of joy, and partly out of respect to him.

Unto a city of Moab, which is in the border of Arnon.] This city seems to have been Ar, (chap. xxi. 15.)

Which is in the utmost coast.] He did him the honour to meet him at the very entrance of his country; and did not think it sufficient to send some of his court to receive him.

Ver. 37. And Balak said unto Balaam, Did not I earnestly send unto thee to call thee?] After this compliment was paid to Balaam, the king could not forbear to let him know, he did not think himself well used by him, whom he had earnestly entreated to come to him, and at the first he would not.

Wherefore camest thou not unto me?] As soon as I sent for thee.

Am I not able indeed to promote thee to honour?] Dost thou doubt of my power to make thee a great man, if thou gratifiest me in my desire? And his readiness he shewed by this honourable reception of him.

Ver. 38. And Balaam said unto Balak, Lo, I am come unto thee.] Say no more of that; but be satisfied that I am now come.

Have I now any power at all to say any thing?] Yet he would not have him expect that he should do all that Balak desired, or he himself was inclined to do; for he was under a higher overruling Power, which he could not gainsay.

The word that God putteth in my mouth, that shall I speak.] He seems to acquaint him that he had received such a command from God, (ver. 35.) and he must be obedient.

Ver. 39. And Balaam went with Balak.] This did not discourage the king of Moab from carrying Balaam along with him into his country; where he hoped he might be persuaded to do as he would have him.

And they came unto Kirjath-huzoth.] The royal city, it is likely; for it signifies in our language the city of streets; that is, a large city, which had many streets and (consequently) inhabitants in it.

Ver. 40. And Balak offered oxen and sheep.] In thankfulness that he had procured Balaam's assistance, as he hoped, against his enemies.

And sent to Balaam.] They were such sacrifices as the Jews called peace-offerings; of which the offerers had a share for themselves and for their friends: and the sacrifice being over, Balak invited Balaam to come to the feast he made thereupon.

And to the princes that were with him.] The princes, I suppose, of Midian and of Moab, who were sent on the embassy to him, and had succeeded in it, (ver. 7. 15.)

Ver. 41. And it came to pass, that on the morrow.] Having rested one night after his journey, Balak would have him go about his business, and see what he could do for him.

Balak took Balaam.] Into his chariot.

And brought him up into the high places of Baal.] All nations worshipped their gods in high places; and Baal was the god of this country; who was worshipped in more high places than one; unto all which he brought Balaam, that he might see where he could take the fullest view of the Israelites, and which of them would be fittest for his purpose. These high places were full of trees, and very shady, (as I observed, Lev. xxvi. 30.) which made them the fitter both for the solemn thoughts and prayers of such as were devout, and for the filthy inclinations and intentions of the wicked. Baal was the name of several gods, both male and female, as our Selden shews in his Syntagma ii. de Diis Syris, cap. 1. And I suppose Chemosh, the god of Moab, is here called by this name (signifying a lord), though that great man seems to take it for Baal-Peor, (cap. 2. of that book.)

That thence he might see the utmost of the people.] i. e. All their armies, to the very skirts of their camp.

CHAP. XXIII.

Ver. 1. AND Balaam said unto Balak, Build me here.] Upon one of the high places; which Balaam, it is likely, pitched upon as fit for his purpose.

Seven altars.] The number seven was much observed we find among the Hebrews, by God's order; (see Lev. iv. 6.) but we never read of more than one altar built by the patriarchs, when they offered their sacrifices; nor was more than one allowed by Moses. Therefore in this there was something of the heathen superstition; who, worshipping the sun (who is principally meant by Baal), offered also to all the seven planets: unless we allow the conjecture of Fortunatus Scacchus, who imagines, that as Moses erected twelve pillars, according to the number of the children of Israel, when he entered them into the covenant of God, (Exod. xxiv. 4.) so Balaam ordered seven altars to be erected, according to the number of the principal houses of Moab, (Myrothec. Sacr. Elæochrysm, par. ii. cap. 59.) But there is no ground for the conceit of Abarbinel, who, in his preface to Leviticus, (sect. 4.) saith, Balaam ordered this in emulation of the seven acceptable altars to God, built by seven men famous for piety; viz. Adam, Abel, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Moses. There is more certainty in this, that these altars were erected in honour either of the Most High, or of the greatest of their gods: for, according to the account which both Festus and Servius have given us of the ancient times, they sacrificed to the celestial gods only upon altars (which were so called, because they were aræ altæ, built high and lofty), whereas to the terrestrial they sacrificed upon the earth; and to the infernal gods, in holes digged in the earth.

And prepare me here seven oxen, and seven rams.] To offer one of each upon the several altars, as it follows, ver. 2. This number was used by pious persons, both in these days, (Job xlii. 8.) and in aftertimes, (1 Chron. xv. 26.)

Ver. 2. And Balak did as Balaam had spoken.] Caused the altars to be built (which was done, either of stones, or of turf), and the sacrifices to be brought.

And Balak and Balaam offered on every altar a bullock and a ram.] Kings, in ancient times, were priests also; as appears by Melchizedeck: but perhaps Balak only presented the sacrifices to be offered for him, and for his people; and Balaam performed the office of a priest. The only doubt is, to whom these sacrifices were offered. I suppose each of them had their several intentions: Balak supplicating Baal by them; and Balaam making his prayer to the Lord, though with such superstitious ceremonies, it is likely, as were used by the worshippers of Baal; in one of whose high places these sacrifices were offered. But it may also be supposed, that Balaam telling Balak he could not effect any thing without the Lord, the God of Israel, persuaded him to join with him at present in his worship, that they might prevail with him to withdraw his presence from the Israelites: for there is no reason to think, that Balaam would go to inquire of the Lord, when he had sacrificed to other gods; and it appears evidently from ver. 4. that he pretended to sacrifice unto God; and would not have presumed surely to tell him so, if he meant otherwise.

Ver. 3. And Balaam said unto Balak.] When he had laid the pieces upon the altars.

Stand by the burnt-offering.] Attend thy sacrifice, and pray to God to accept it. By this it appears, that these sacrifices were of a different nature from those mentioned in chap. xxii. 40. being burnt-offerings which were wholly consumed. And one of them seems to have been offered particularly for Balak, which he calls his burnt-offering; as the rest were for the princes of Moab, who, it is likely, stood by them representing all the people.

And here it is to be observed, that, in old time, before the law of Moses was given, burnt-offerings served for all purposes in Divine worship; whether they gave thanks for blessings, or deprecated evil things, or prayed for good. Thus Noah, when he returned thanks to God for his preservation in the ark, offered burnt-offerings, (Gen. viii. 20.)

And when Job beseeched God to pardon his sons, (chap. i. 5.) and his friends, (chap. xlii. 8.) he offered sacrifices of this sort: and so did Balak and Balaam here use them, to procure blessings upon Moab, and a curse upon Israel.

And I will go.] By myself, into some private place, to consult with God, and to exercise his enchantments, (as may be gathered from chap. xxiv. 1.) whereby he thought he might prevail for such a power as he desired, of cursing the people of Israel.

Peradventure the Lord will come to meet me.] He durst not be confident, because he had lately opposed his proceeding (chap. xxii. 31.) in a frightful manner.

And whatsoever he sheweth me.] Whatsoever he reveals to me, either by word or otherwise.

I will tell thee.] Deal faithfully with thee, and conceal nothing from thee.

And he went to a high place.] Or rather, into a valley; for he was now in a high place when he sacrificed, and did not go into another high place, but down into the plain (as the Hebrew word properly signifies), where he might, in some solitary retirement, address himself to God, and expect his presence with him. So we translate it in the margin, he went solitary. Therefore, if we retain the other translation, it must be understood of some part of the high place, where he might be solitary, viz. into the grove, which high places seldom wanted. In these high places they built their temples, and had their oracles: as we learn from Justin, lib. xxiv. cap. 6. where he saith, the temple of Apollo "positum est in monte Parnasso, &c." was seated upon the mountain Parnassus: and from Pausanias, who, speaking of the cave of Trophonius in Bœotia, saith, ἔστι δὲ τὸ μαντεῖον ὑπὲρ τὸ ἄλσος ἐπὶ τοῦ ὄρους, the oracle is in a grove upon a mountain. The like might be observed of other oracles; which may countenance this conjecture, that some such pretended oracle might be in this high place, where Balaam went for direction from God.

Ver. 4. And God met Balaam.] Appeared unto him, as he had been wont to do in other places, chap. xxii. 9. 20. where the word Elohim is constantly used, as it is here and every where else, till we come to ver. 16. which strengthens the opinion, that the Lord hitherto spake to him only by an angel.

And he said unto him.] i. e. Balaam said unto God, when he saw him appear.

I have prepared seven altars, and have offered upon every altar a bullock and a ram.] This shews he sacrificed unto God, and not unto Baal: and he represents it to God that he might be moved thereby to condescend to his desire. For sacrificing was a form of supplication, as we find in other places, particularly 1 Sam. xiii. 12. and that which he begged of God was, in all likelihood, that he would give him power to curse Israel.

Ver. 5. And he put a word into Balaam's mouth.] Told him what he should say. And therefore (saith Maimonides) he spake by the Spirit of God: which he makes account was the second degree of prophecy. Whence that description Balaam gives of himself, "He hath said, who heard the words of God," (par. ii. More Nevochim, cap. 45.)

And said, Return unto Balak, and thus shalt thou speak.] He commanded him to speak unto Balak, at his return to him, as he was instructed, and no otherwise. The words he bade him speak, are those that we read below, (ver. 7, 8, &c.)

Ver. 6. And he returned unto him, and, lo, he stood by his burnt-sacrifice.] He found him in the very same posture wherein he left him: (ver. 3.) which shews Balaam did not go far, nor stay long before he returned; and that Balak was earnest in his supplications.

He, and all the princes of Moab.] Who were concerned in the good success of his negotiation.

Ver. 7. And he took up.] A Hebrew phrase for speaking aloud.

His parable.] Or, prophetical speech; which was sometimes delivered in parables, properly so called: that is, not in plain words, but in apt figures and resemblances, (concerning which see Maimonides, par. ii. cap. 43.) But here the word parable signifies (as it doth in the book of Job) a weighty speech, expressed in sublime and majestic words, Job xxvii. 1. xxix. 1.

And said, Balak the king of Moab hath brought me from Aram.] See chap. xxii. 5.

From the mountains of the east.] The country of Mesopotamia lay eastward of Moab: and that part of it towards Arabia was stony and mountainous. (See Bochartus in his Phaleg. lib. ii. cap. 6.)

Saying, Come, curse me Jacob; and come, defy Israel.] Two different expressions for the same thing; only the latter word (which we translate defy) imports something of fury; because he would have had him curse them in such a prophetic rage, as should have the most direful effects upon them.

Ver. 8. How shall I curse him whom God hath not cursed? &c.] As much as if he had said, Balak desires of me that which is impossible. In the Jerusalem Targum this verse is thus paraphrased: How shall I curse the house of Jacob, when the Word of the Lord hath blessed them? or how shall I diminish the family of Israel, when the Word of the Lord hath multiplied them?

Ver. 9. For from the top of the rocks.] Upon which he then stood, when he spake these words.

I see him.] As Balak desired he might, (chap. xxii. 41.) though for another purpose; that he might curse them.

And from the hills I behold him.] The same thing again, in other words, according to the manner of the eastern people. And both these may relate, not only to the present view he had of the camp of Israel, but to their future settlement in their own land; wherein they were represented to him as dwelling securely, under the special protection of the Almighty.

Lo, the people shall dwell.] In the land of Canaan.

Alone.] Not mingled with other nations, but separated from them by different laws, religion, and manners. It seems also to import their security and safety, by the situation of their country, and God's care of them.

And shall not be reckoned among the nations.] Be a peculiar people by themselves; and therefore not liable to the power of my curses, like other nations. All this came to pass, partly by the natural situation of their country, which was surrounded with high mountains, and rocky precipices, so that the coming to it was very difficult; but more especially by their rites and customs; and particularly by their diet, which restrained them from common conversation with other nations, because they could not eat of their food (swine's flesh, for instance, which was a delicate dish among the gentiles, was an abomination to the Israelites). By which means they were the better secured from learning the religion of the gentiles, having so little communication with them, that they were called by Diodorus Siculus, and others, an unsociable people, and thought to have an enmity to the rest of the world.

Ver. 10. Who can count the dust of Jacob.] This may refer either to their present, or their future increase; which was so great, that they might be compared to the dust of the earth, or the sand on the sea-shore, which is without number. Hereby he confirmed the promise made by God to Abraham, Gen. xiii. 16. and to Israel, chap. xxviii. 14. where he saith expressly, "Thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth."

And the number of the fourth part of Israel.] Any one of their camps, every one of which was grown to a vast number: for the whole host of Israel was divided into four camps, under the standard of Judah, Reuben, Ephraim and Dan (as we read in the second chapter of this book), one of which camps lay more plainly before him than the rest, viz. that on the west, under the standard of Ephraim.

Let me die the death of the righteous.] By the righteous he means Israel, who were now a people free from idolatry, which was the great crime of those days: and he desires either to be as happy as they in the other world, or that he might not die an immature and violent death, but enjoy such a long life here as was promised to them. The author of Sepher Cosri takes it in the former sense; alleging this place as a proof that a future state was believed in ancient times, though not so clearly expressed in the prophetical writings, as other things are: for there is a certain prayer, saith he, of one that prophesied by the Holy Ghost, who desired that he might die the death of the righteous, (par. i. sect. 115.)

And my last end be like his!] Or, let my posterity (for so the word we here translate last end often signifies, Psal. cix. 13. Dan. xi. 4.) or, those that come after me, be like unto his descendants.

Ver. 11. And Balak said unto Balaam, What hast thou done unto me?] This is very surprising.

I took thee to curse mine enemies, and, behold, thou hast blessed them altogether.] Thou hast not only frustrated my desires in not cursing them, but, quite contrary, hast pronounced great blessings upon them. For so the Hebrew words signify, Blessed them with blessings.

Ver. 12. And he answered and said, Must I not take heed to speak that which the Lord hath put in my mouth?] He had told him so before, more than once, (chap. xxii. 23. xxiii. 3.) and now makes him judge, whether it was safe for him to disobey the Lord to comply with his desires.

Ver. 13. And Balak said unto him, Come, I pray thee, with me to another place?] He thought Balaam gave him a reasonable answer; and, therefore, gently entreats him to make a trial, whether God would be pleased to be more favourable to his desires if he sought him in some other place. For whatsoever Balaam thought of this matter, Balak was possessed with a superstitious fancy, that the very place or prospect had been a cause concurrent to produce the contrary effect to what he desired, and therefore entreated he would come with him to another, where he might not see too many of them at once.

From whence thou mayest see them.] It seems this was thought necessary to make their curses effectual; that they should have a sight of those whom they cursed, and that they should look upon them.

Thou shalt see but the utmost part of them.] The skirts of their camps.

And shalt not see them all.] He imagined, perhaps, that Balaam was affrighted at the sight of their multitude, and therefore durst not meddle with them.

And curse me them from thence.] He seems to desire him to curse only that small parcel of the Israelites whom he saw in the utmost part of the camp, hoping he might by degrees get them all, in like manner, destroyed.

Ver. 14. And he brought him unto the field of Zophim.] Or, as some translate it, unto Sede-Zophim; a place by the very name apt to enchant a superstitious mind with expectation of success, as Dr. Jackson speaks. It is thought by some to be so called from the watchers that were placed here, which the word Zophim imports.

To the top of Pisgah.] A very high mountain in the country of Moab, from whence one might see a great way, and take a view of all the parts of Canaan, (Deut. iii. 27. xxxiv. 1, 2, &c.) But on that side of it whither Balak brought him, Balaam could not see much of the camp of Israel. It is likely he thought, by bringing him to a place so exceeding high, he should be nearer heaven, and so procure a more favourable audience than before.

And built seven altars, and offered a bullock and a ram on every altar.] As he had done before at Balaam's desire, in another high place, (ver. 1, 2.) for there only he imagined their sacrifices would be acceptable. From hence Conradus Pellicanus concludes Balaam to have been a worshipper of the true God (as Jethro was), because he still continues to offer only such clean creatures as were wont to be sacrificed to him by his own people.

Ver. 15. And he said unto Balak, Stand here by thy burnt-offering.] The same direction which he had given before, (ver. 3.)

While I meet the Lord yonder.] In a place to which he pointed. Balaam made a peradventure of it before, whether the Lord would come to meet him or not, (ver. 3.) but now he confidently expects it; though he endeavoured (it appears from chap. xxiv. 1.) still to compass his bad ends by his enchantments.

Ver. 16. And the Lord met Balaam.] This is never said before, but only that God met him (by his angel, as the Jews interpret it), which I take to be much short of what is here said, that the Lord himself now met him; that is, there was a glorious appearance of the Schechinah to him (though not in such lustre, I suppose, as when it appeared to Moses), which so amazed him, that after this he never went so much as to inquire what he should say or do: for, though he doubted, perhaps, of what the angel said, yet now he was fully assured the Israelites must be blessed.

And he put a word in his mouth.] Instructed him what he should say to Balak.

And said, Go again unto Balak, and say thus.] viz. All that we read ver. 18—20, &c. which is a great deal more than he had said before.

Ver. 17. And when he came to him, behold, he stood by his burnt-offering, and the princes of Moab with him.] See ver. 6.

And Balak said unto him, What hath the Lord spoken?] He was more solicitous to know his doom than he was before, when he asked no such question; and plainly demonstrated, that he believed Balaam went to inquire of the Lord.

Ver. 18. And he took up his parable.] See ver. 7.

And said, Rise up Balak, and hear.] If this word rise up hath respect to the outward reverence, which was wont to be shewn to all messages brought from God, (which was expressed by rising up to receive them, as appears from the story of another king of Moab, Judges iii. 20.) then, after the sacrifice was ended, at which they stood, Balak sat down until Balaam could be ready to acquaint him with the mind of God. But it may have respect only to the mind, and signify, stir up thyself to attend; awaken thy thoughts, and listen to what I say.

And hearken unto me, thou son of Zippor.] The same thing repeated with more earnestness: for to give ear, as the word is in the Hebrew, imports something more than merely to hear; viz. diligent and earnest attention of mind to what is spoken.

Ver. 19. God is not a man, that he should lie.] Do not imagine that God is like to one of us: he can by no sacrifices, or prayers, or other means, be induced to break his word; and, therefore, it is in vain for me any longer to importune him to curse Israel, when he hath said he will bless them.

Neither the son of man.] An usual variation of the expression of the same thing. (Psal. viii. 4.)

That he should repent.] Alter his mind, when he hath absolutely resolved any thing. Balak seems to have fancied, that, by the change of the place where he sacrificed, (ver. 13.) he might procure a change of the Divine counsels.

Hath he said, and shall he not do it?] What should hinder? for he wants no power to execute his will; and he cannot be moved to revoke his word by better information; nor can any thing happen which he did not foresee, to make him do otherwise than he intended.

Or hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good?] This is the same with the former, after the prophetical manner of speaking, Omnia per juga repetendo (as Conradus Pellicanus glosses) ad exaggerationem: only the foregoing words may be thought to refer to his threatenings, and these to his promises.

Ver. 20. Behold, I have received commandment to bless; and he hath blessed, and I cannot reverse it.] In these words he applies the general proposition, in the foregoing verse, to this particular case: God hath ordered me to pronounce a blessing upon Israel, for he himself hath blessed them; and I can neither reverse that blessing, nor go against his order.

Ver. 21. He hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, neither hath he seen perverseness in Israel.] Both the word aven (which we translate iniquity) and the word amal (which we translate perverseness) signify frequently in Scripture the highest wickedness, viz. idolatry. And so Onkelos here understood it, when he thus paraphrased these words: I see that there are none who worship idols in the house of Jacob, nor any servants of trouble and vanity (so they called idols) in Israel. And accordingly the Vulgar Latin expressly translates this verse thus, There is no idol in Jacob, nor is there any image seen in Israel: which seemed so clear a truth to Johannes Forsterus, a famous professor of the Hebrew tongue in the beginning of the Reformation, that, in his explication of both these words in his Lexicon, he saith, "From this place all the prophets borrow these phrases, and translated them to express impiety, i. e. idolatrous worship, devised according to men's own humours and desires, and by the instinct of the devil: for Moses was the fountain of all the prophets." Thus he writes upon the word אָוֶן, and he repeats it again upon the word עָמָל. So that this is the reason Balaam gives, why God had blessed, and he could not curse them, because they were free from idolatry; unto which, unless they could be seduced, there was no hope that God would deliver them unto the power of their enemies: for which reason Balaam afterward counselled this prince to entice them to this sin by beautiful women, as the only way to move God to be angry with them.

There are indeed a great many that take these words in the common sense, for all manner of sin; which God is said not to see in this people, i. e. so as to mark it out for punishment; for though they were many ways great offenders, yet he had such an indulgent kindness to them, that he would not correct them for every sin which they committed. But this returns to the former exposition; that they were safe, as long as they kept themselves from the great transgression, that is, idolatry.

The Lord his God is with him.] They worshipping God alone, were therefore under his special care and protection. Onkelos renders it, the Word of the Lord his God is his help. And so the Jerusalem Targum.

And the shout of a king is among them.] God being their king, he prophesies that they should always triumph over their enemies: for he alludes to the shouts which are made when a king or great captain returns victorious with the spoils of those he hath vanquished. So the meaning of the whole verse is this, in brief: Since they do not worship idols, but cleave to the Lord their God, and serve him alone, he is present with them, not only to preserve them from their enemies, but to give them glorious victories over them.

Ver. 22. God brought them out of Egypt.] That they might be his worshippers and servants, which if they continue he will not desert them. For God brought them forth from thence that they might be his peculiar people, and he their King and their God, as he often saith himself, Lev. xi. 45. xxii. 23. xxv. 38. Numb. xv. 41. all which places are observed by the author of Sepher Cosri, (par. ii. sect. 50.)

He hath as it were the strength of an unicorn.] Some would have this referred to God, who brought them out of Egypt by a mighty power; because he speaks in the plural number of those to whom the former sentence belongs. But this is no good reason; for the Scripture frequently varies the number, when the same person is spoken of. And in chap. xxiv. 8. it is expressly said, God brought him (i. e. Israel) out of Egypt; and he hath the strength, &c. which every one allows is spoken of the Israelites, who are said to have the strength of this creature, with whom they are compared; or rather the height, as the Hebrew word certainly signifies, Psalm xxv. 4. The strength of the hills (or rather, the heights of the hills, as it is in the margin) are his also: and Job xxii. 25. The Almighty shall be thy defence, and thou shalt have plenty of silver. So the sense led our interpreters to translate the Hebrew word תועפות, which may be literally here rendered great heaps of silver. These are the only places where this word is found. The only difficulty is, what creature it is which is here called reem; which we translate (as many others have done) an unicorn: which, though most now take to be a fabulous creature that is not in being, yet Tho. Bartholinus, in his Anatomical Histories, (Centur. ii. Histor. 61.) tells us, that an ambassador from the king of Guinea to the duke of Courland, assured him, at Copenhagen, that there is a beast in Africa of the bigness of an ordinary horse, very swift and fierce, which hath a horn in its forehead about three spans in length; the dead carcass of which he had seen, though never one alive. But if this be supposed to be true, it is not the creature here meant; for it is plain by the Scripture, that the reem hath two horns, Deut. xxxiii. 17. where we read of the horns of the unicorn (as we translate it), to which the two tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh are compared. (See also Psalm xxii. 27.) Therefore the famous Bochartus, after a long discussion of other opinions, thinks it most probable, that the reem is a kind of goat, which the Arabians called algazel, and is now called gazellas; which is a tall creature (some of them as high as a stag) with long and sharp horns. So that Balaam foretells the Israelites should be as eminent among other people as the reem was among other kinds of goats. Unless we will think it refers to what the Arabians observe, that it is proper to this animal to carry his head very high, and to erect his ears, which is an excellent emblem of the people of Israel; who being lately oppressed in Egypt, were asserted by God into a state of liberty, and raised to a great height of glory, in order to be advanced unto a higher, (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 27.) At this Onkelos seemed to have aimed when he translates these words thus, fortitude and exaltation are his; taking reem not for a proper name but for an appellative, as if it were derived from ramam, which signifies to exalt. I shall only add, that there is one who refers these words neither to God nor to the Israelites, but to Egypt beforementioned; as if the sense was, Though the Egyptians were as strong as an unicorn, they were not able to detain the Israelites any longer in bondage to them; but God brought them thence with a mighty hand and outstretched arm: so Joseph. Hispanus, (lib. iii. Ikaurim, cap. 8.)

Ver. 23. Surely there is no enchantment against Jacob, neither is there any divination against Israel.] Neither I, nor any body else, have power to hurt them, by all the secret arts of sorcery and soothsaying, which are practised in the world. It is not proper here to mention the various sorts of them; but it is manifest, from ancient history, that these curious arts (as St. Luke calls them) had got a kind of sovereignty in the eastern nations, who for many ages were much addicted to them. One of our own church hath said many excellent things concerning the original of this sorcery and idolatry, which commonly accompanied each other; to whom I refer the reader: (see Dr. Jackson's Original of Unbelief, &c. cap. 19.) The Vulgar Latin takes these words, as if they were spoken in praise of the Israelites, that there were no enchantments or divinations used among them, nor any other diabolical arts, which were forbidden by their law in several places. From these they being as free as from idolatry, (mentioned ver. 21.) they were secure of God's favour to them. And so we acknowledge, in the margin of our Bibles, the words may be translated, There is no enchantment in Jacob, or among them: from which God intended in all ages to preserve them by the prophets he raised up to them. And thus R. Solomon expounds this verse, either to signify that they could not be cursed, because they were not given to enchantments and divinations; or that they needed not to make use of diviners and magicians, having all that was needful for them to know revealed to them by God's prophets, and by urim and thummim, &c.

According to this time it shall be said of Jacob and of Israel, What hath God wrought!] The LXX. translate the first words κατὰ καιρὸν, when time shall be; or, upon all occasions: not only now, but in future ages, men shall relate, with admiration, what God hath wrought for this people; not only in bringing them out of Egypt, but in conducting them into Canaan; in drying up Jordan, as he did the Red Sea; and subduing the Canaanites, as he overthrew Pharaoh and his host, &c. If there be any difference between Jacob and Israel, the former signifies this people, when they were in their low estate; and the latter, when they were eminently exalted: in both which God did wonderful things for them, which astonished all that observed.

Ver. 24. Behold, the people shall rise up as a great lion.] The Hebrew word labi certainly signifies a lioness, which is no less, but rather more fierce than a lion, and so represented by Herodotus, (lib. iii. cap. 108.) and many other authors mentioned by Bochartus in his Hierozoicon, (par. i. lib. iii. cap. 1.)

And lift up himself as a young lion.] The Hebrew word ari is used in general for any lion whatsoever, without respect unto age. They that would have it signify a younger sort, take it for a lion full grown and adult (as they speak) of a middle age, between cephir, which signifies a young lion, and sachel, which signifies an old. And the Israelites are here said to rise up, and to lift up themselves, like to these fierce creatures, to signify their assaulting their enemies with an undaunted courage.

He shall not lie down till he eat of the prey.] Which lions rend and tear with their claws and teeth, irresistibly and speedily. So the Hebrew word tereph (which we render prey) imports; the flesh of beasts torn in pieces.

And drink the blood of the slain.] He alludes to the ravenousness of lions; and signifies the entire and perfect victory the Israelites should win over their enemies. For this prophecy hath a peculiar respect to the conquest of the Canaanites under the conduct of Joshua.

Ver. 25. And Balak said unto Balaam, Neither curse them at all, nor bless them at all.] It seems he thought his blessings to be as powerful as his curses; and therefore desires him to forbear both, if he could not have what he desired.

Ver. 26. And Balaam answered, Told I thee not, saying, All that the Lord speaks, that must I do?] As I cannot do any thing against the mind and will of God, so I must do as he bids me, (ver. 3. 12.)

Ver. 27. And Balak said unto Balaam, Come, I pray thee, and I will bring thee to another place.] Still he fancies, according to the superstition of those days, there might be something unlucky in the place, that made his prayers unsuccessful; which might prove acceptable in another. For, as the Syrians imagined in future ages, that some gods were powerful in the hills, who could do nothing in the plains, (1 Kings xx. 23. 28.) so, it seems, there was such a conceit at this time in these countries, that some gods delighted more in one hill than they did in another; for he still brings Balaam to another high place. Such a conceit we see remains to this day in the Romish church, where the lady and the rood of one place are thought far more powerful, and therefore more frequented than those of another.

Peradventure it will please God that thou mayest curse me them from thence.] He said nothing of God's permission before, (ver. 13.) but now was convinced his consent was to be gained; and would not despair of it, but thought it possible that very thing might seem right and good in his eyes (as the Hebrew phrase here is) in a new place, which displeased him in both the former.

Ver. 28. And Balak brought Balaam to the top of Peor.] This was the most famous high place in all the country of Moab; where, as Mr. Selden conjectures, Baal had a temple, and was worshipped; and thence called Baal-Peor. So Theodoret and Suidas, Βεὴλ ὁ Κρόνος, Φεγὼρ δὲ ὁ τόπος ἐν ᾧ ἐτιμᾶτο. Beel signifies Saturn, and Phegor (or, as we pronounce it, Peor) the place where he was worshipped. Just as the Greeks called Jupiter by the name of Olympius, and Mercurius of Cyllenus, &c. And, in all likelihood, by Beth-Peor, (Deut. xxxiv. 6.) which in English is the house of Peor, in the land of Moab, is meant the temple of Baal which stood upon the mountain, for so the word Beth signifies frequently among the Hebrews, not an ordinary house, but the house of some god: as Beth-Ashtaroth, (1 Sam. xxxi. 10.) and Beth-Baal, (1 Kings xvi. 32.) And there is often mention of Beth-shemesh in the holy writings (Joshua xv. 10. Judges i. 33. and many other places), which signifies the temple of the sun; from whence the word Βαίσαμψα, among the Arabians upon the Red Sea, which Stephanus (de Urbibus) expounds, ὁ οἶκος τοῦ ἡλίου, the house of the sun. (See Syntagma i. de Diis Syris, cap. 5.)

That looketh towards Jeshimon.] See chap. xxi. 20.

Ver. 29. And Balaam said unto Balak, Build me here seven altars, and prepare me here seven bullocks and seven rams.] He orders the very same sacrifices he did at first, without any difference, (ver. 1.) either not knowing any other method of obtaining their desires, or thinking it in vain to devise any other.

Ver. 30. And Balak did as Balaam had said, and offered a bullock and a ram upon every altar.] He was wholly governed by Balaam in this; and though he changed the place, made no alteration in the sacrifice, which was as complete and perfect as any in those times offered.

Here is no mention made of the time when these things were done; but we may be certain all the three forementioned solemn sacrifices, in the three several places, were not offered upon one and the same day. And superstitious people, as all histories tell us, having been as curious in the choice of days as well as places, it is probable that Balak picked out some day or hour which he thought might be more lucky to him than the foregoing.

CHAP. XXIV.

Ver. 1. AND when Balaam saw that it pleased the Lord to bless Israel.] Of which he had given him a double proof, chap. xxii. 5, &c. 16, &c.

He went not out as at other times.] See chap. xxii. 3. 15.

To seek for enchantments.] This implies that he had hitherto, in the process of his business, used some wicked arts to effect his ends, or desired to be directed to them; but being not able to obtain any thing, but commands cross to all his designs, he gave himself up wholly to the conduct of God's Holy Spirit, and did not so much as offer to seek for enchantments. In the Hebrew the words are, to meet with enchantments; unto which he hoped to be directed, that he might be able to curse Israel: for though he addressed himself to the true God, (whom he calls the Lord, chap. xxiii. 26.) yet it was in a superstitious way; with such rites and ceremonies of worship, as were not of God's appointment; but either devised by evil spirits, or very grateful to them; whereby he hoped to be shewn by what means he might disable Israel, and deliver them into the hand of Balak. For the ancient magic derived from Zoroaster was nothing else, as Plato pretends, (in Alcibiade i.) but the knowledge of Divine things, and the right way of worshipping God: and Apuleius saith the same of it, that it was "diis immortalibus accepta, colendi eos ac venerandi pergnara," &c. a science acceptable to the immortal gods, very skilful how to worship and honour them; being pious, and knowing in Divine things; which sufficiently betrays this Divine knowledge (as they call it) to be impious; for Zoroaster instructed his disciples in the worship of the fire, as an emblem, at the best, of the sun; which they looked upon as a visible image of this invisible God, and upon that account worshipped it. After his time, it is manifest, this heavenly knowledge, as they esteem it, degenerated into more uncouth rites, and wicked arts, whereby they pretend to be able to make the gods do what they pleased. Pliny mentions an herb, (lib. xxiv. cap. 17.) which he saith the magicians used, quùm Deos velint evocare, when they would call out the gods, and draw them to their purpose. In which power they so gloried, that the witch in Apuleius threatened the gods themselves with the greatest mischief; and boasted she could deprive the stars of their light; and by her charms control, not only the moon, but the sun himself, and the gods of all sorts. And as for mankind, nothing is more known than those magical words, devovere, defigere, obligare; which are proper to the black art, as Salmasius observes, (upon Solinus, p. 1091.) which, by incantations, deprecations, direful execrations, herbs, fascinations, so confounded the mind of him who was thus devoted (as they term it), that he could remember nothing of what he was about, nor discharge any function of nature. The several species of it are mentioned by Maimonides, who saith the Zabii pretended to exercise this power, not only over particular persons, but over whole provinces, by certain words, and actions, and things, which nobody can understand to have any virtue in them, (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 37.)

But he set his face towards the wilderness.] He stirred not from the place where the sacrifice was offered, as he had been wont to do, but only looked towards the wilderness, where the Israelites lay encamped, (chap. xxii. 1.)

Ver. 2. And Balaam lifted up his eyes.] To look round about him.

And he saw Israel abiding in his tents, &c.] In the order God had appointed in the second chapter of this book, ver. 52. where he commands them to pitch their tents, every man by his own camp, and by his own standard, throughout their hosts.

And the Spirit of God came upon him.] From whence Maimonides concludes, he was a prophet of the second rank, who spake by the Holy Ghost, (More Nevoch. par. ii. cap. 45.)

Ver. 3. And he took up his parable, and said.] He pronounced what follows with a loud voice, that all might hear. For so the Hebrew words may be interpreted, he lifted up his parable. (See chap. xxiii. 7.)

Balaam the son of Beor hath said.] Though the Spirit of God came upon him, which suggested the words mentioned, ver. 5—7, &c. yet it did not alter the temper and disposition of his mind; which was no less vain and ambitious than it was covetous, and possessed with a hatred of the Israelites; as appears by the counsel which he gave, at last, how to ruin them: this vanity seems to be expressed in these, and in the following words, wherein he magnifies himself more than the Spirit of God.

And the man whose eyes were open, hath said.] Who when he was awake received revelations from God, which was an extraordinary favour; for commonly he appeared to men in a dream. Others translate it, whose eyes were shut, i. e. who was in a trance or ecstasy, so that he saw nothing with his bodily eyes, but only with his mind. The Jerusalem Targum thus paraphrases these words (which shews he looked upon them as a boasting of himself), "The man said, who was honoured above his brethren; to whom that was revealed, which was hidden from all the prophets."

Ver. 4. He hath said, who heard the words of God.] Mark what he saith, who delivers the words which he received from God.

Which saw the vision of the Almighty.] With whom he was so familiar, that he himself, at last, appeared to him in a vision, (chap. xxiii. 16.) as at first he appeared to him by an angel, (chap. xxii. 35.)

Falling into a trance.] There being in the Hebrew only the word nophel, which signifies falling, we supply the sense by adding into a trance; lest any one should think he fell to the ground, or fell asleep; which seems not to be the meaning; but that he was in a rapture, perceiving nothing by his outward senses. Yet the forementioned Targum takes it as if he had fallen flat on his face; and the LXX. translate it, he saw the vision of God in sleep; according to that, Gen. xv. 12. a deep sleep fell upon Abraham; where the word naphela is thought by some to give a good explication of nophel in this place.

But having his eyes open.] His mind being then possessed with a clear apprehension of things, which God revealed to him, when his senses were all locked up, and could discern nothing.

Ver. 5. How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob! and thy tabernacles, O Israel!] The same thing expressed in different words; which was an usual elegancy in those countries: wherein he declares his admiration of the beautiful order in which he saw them pitched in the plains of Moab.

Ver. 6. As the valleys are they spread forth.] This refers either to the tabernacles, which extended themselves on each side of a wide space, which, like a valley, lay between; or rather to the Israelites themselves, whom he compares to those fruitful valleys which abound with water: for the Hebrew word signifies either valleys or brooks.

As gardens by the river's side.] Which were far more green and flourishing, cool and pleasant, than those that lay in dry places.

As the trees of the lign-aloes.] Growing in those gardens, or by the river's side; which perfumed the air by their sweet odours. For there are two sorts of aloes observed by the ancients; the one a tree which was very odoriferous, called Κάλαμος Ἰνδικὸς, and Ἐρυθραῖος, growing in India and Arabia; and the other a plant or herb, out of which was pressed a purging juice: the former is often joined with myrrh in the Holy Scripture, and was burnt as a perfume, and called by the ancients Ξυλαλόης, (as Salmasius observes in his Exercit. Plin. upon Solinus, p. 1053, 1054, &c.) which is the lign or wood-aloes here spoken of. And Plutarch, in his Symposiacs, (lib. vi. cap. 7.) saith, some were wont to colour their wine, ἢ ἀλόαις, ἢ κιννα μώμοις, either with aloes, or with cinnamons (which is meant of this wood-aloes), which gave the wine a pleasant taste.

Which the Lord hath planted.] Which grew naturally of themselves (solo Dei nutu, as Bochartus glosses), without any labour, care, or art of man used about them.

And as cedar-trees beside the waters.] The cedar was one of the most goodly trees in those countries, upon many accounts, particularly for its fragrancy; the Greeks being wont to burn the wood of it upon their altars, as the same Salmasius there observes, (p. 951, 952.) By all these metaphors, Balaam sets forth the present and future prosperity of the Israelites, and their fame, which spread itself into all nations round about; and seems to be represented by the sweet odours here mentioned.

Ver. 7. He shall pour the water out of his buckets.] I take this to be meant of God's pouring down rain abundantly, out of the clouds, upon the valleys, gardens, and trees, unto which the Israelites are compared; signifying that they should be exceedingly blessed by him: for they stood in need of nothing more than rain in those countries.

And his seed shall be in many waters.] Or, by many waters; i. e. be sown in a ground well watered, and consequently bring forth a plentiful crop, (Isa. xxxii. 20.) There are those who refer both these to their numerous posterity; procreation of children being sometimes expressed in Scripture by the metaphors of waters, and fountains, and cisterns, as every one knows. And both the LXX. and Onkelos interpret this of one particular person that should arise of their seed. For thus the former of them renders this part of the verse; "There shall come a Man out of his seed, who shall rule over many nations." And the latter of them paraphrases in this manner; "There shall be a great King, who shall be anointed of his children, and shall have dominion over many people;" which the Jerusalem Targum saith expressly is Christ: for thus this verse begins in that paraphrase; "A king shall arise out of his sons, and their Redeemer from among them," &c. and thus concludes; "and the kingdom of the king Messias shall be magnificently exalted."

And his king shall be higher than Agag.] This seems to have been the name of all the kings of the Amalekites, (for we read of one called Agag long after this time, 1 Sam. xv. 8, 9.) as Abimelech was the name of the Philistine kings, and Pharaoh of the Egyptian. And at this time, no nation thereabouts was in greater reputation than the Amalekites, (ver. 20.) who thought themselves able to obstruct the Israelites' passage into Canaan; and gave a very early proof of the high opinion of their own power and prowess, by attacking the Israelites as soon as they came out of Egypt. Balaam therefore foretells the king of Israel should be the greatest of all other (for he was acquainted with none higher than Agag); which some think hath a peculiar respect to their first king Saul, who subdued the Amalekites, and took Agag captive. But his successor was far greater than he; and the Jews themselves think this hath its full completion in the Lord Christ.

And his kingdom shall be exalted.] They shall increase and multiply, till their kingdom be greatly enlarged; as it was in the days of David and Solomon, who were but shadows of the great king Messiah.

Ver. 8. God brought him out of Egypt; he hath as it were the strength of an unicorn.] All the power of Egypt could not detain them in slavery; but they came out from thence with a strong and high hand, (Exod. xiii. 9. xiv. 8.) and are grown a mighty people. See the foregoing chapter, (ver. 22.) where this hath been explained.

He shall eat up the nations his enemies.] Utterly destroy the seven nations of Canaan.

And shall break their bones.] So that they shall never recover their strength.

And pierce them through with his arrows.] Having given them their deadly wound: or, as some translate the Hebrew words, break their arrows in pieces; i. e. quite disarm them.

Ver. 9. He couched, he lay down.] He prophesies that the Israelites, having conquered the Canaanites, should settle in their land, and take their rest, and live securely: which he speaks of with such confidence, as if it were already done.

As a lion, and as a great lion.] See chap. xxiii. 24. the signification of ari and labi.

Who shall stir him up?] Give them any disturbance. It is observed of lions, that they do not betake themselves to remote or secret places, when they go to sleep; but lie down any where, (as Oppianus describes them, lib. iii.) as if they understood, that, let them sleep where they pleased, nobody durst meddle with them: (see Bochartus in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 2.) and therefore being applied to the Israelites, signifies such an absolute and secure possession of the land of Canaan, that none should have the boldness to assault, or give them any disquiet: which came to pass chiefly in the days of David and Solomon.

Blessed be he that blesseth thee, and cursed is he that curseth thee.] These are the very words wherewith Isaac concluded his blessing of his son Jacob, (Gen. xxvii. 29.) which God now confirmed from the mouth of one of their enemies, who spake, at this time, by his Spirit.

Ver. 10. And Balak's anger was kindled against Balaam.] He could no longer forbear to express his indignation, to be thus treated by Balaam (whom he had sent for a great way, and entertained for some time), and therefore stopped him from proceeding, for the present, any further in his prophecy.

And Balak said unto Balaam.] It is likely he was so full of wrath, that he could not speak presently, but expressed it only in his looks and actions.

I called thee to curse mine enemies, and thou hast altogether blessed them.] Thou hast not said one word to my purpose, but all quite contrary.

These three times.] Though I have been at great expense, and built altars, and offered many sacrifices, in three several places: but at what distance of time, one from another, doth not appear.

Ver. 11. Therefore now flee thou unto thy place.] Get thee home immediately, and stay not a moment longer here; for that is imported in the word flee, which indicates that he could not endure the sight of him, while he remained thus angry: and, as he banished him his presence, so he commanded him to make all possible haste out of his country.

I thought to promote thee to great honour.] And to bestow as much wealth upon him as he desired; which is included in the word honour, (chap. xxiii. 17.)

But, lo, the Lord.] Whom thou pretendest to obey.

Hath kept thee back from honour.] By not permitting thee to comply with my desire. It is uncertain, whether these words were spoke in anger and scorn, or seriously and in good earnest; believing he was hindered by the Lord's will and pleasure from cursing Israel; which he had more reason to believe, than he had to hope he might obtain liberty to curse them, (chap. xxiii. 27.) and therefore was, without all reason, in this passion against Balaam.

Ver. 12. And Balaam spake unto Balak.] Prayed Balak to hear him patiently a few words before he departed.

Spake I not also to thy messengers, which thou sentest unto me, saying.] Did not I, before I saw thee, tell those that came to invite me to thee, the very same which I told thee afterward.

Ver. 13. If Balak would give me his house full of gold and silver, I cannot go beyond the commandment of the Lord, to do more or less.] So he told his messengers, (chap. xxii. 18.)

Of my mind.] According as I please.

But what the Lord saith, that will I speak.] So he told Balak himself, (chap. xxii. 38.) All which he recalls to his mind, to shew him that there was no cause for his anger, he having performed as much as he undertook; which was to follow God's directions, as he had done strictly. And it is likely, that by this just representation of what had passed between them, he brought Balak to a cooler temper, so that he suffered him to go on, to deliver what follows.

Ver. 14. And now, behold, I go to my people.] And now I will obey thee, as well as God, and be gone to my own country.

Come therefore, and I will advertise thee, &c.] But before I go, permit me to give thee some advice. So the Hebrew word jaatz constantly signifies, to give counsel. And so the Vulgar here translates it; but took it for the wicked advice, which we read, in the next chapter, was executed after Balaam's departure, and of which he was certainly the author, (chap. xxxi. 16.) and therefore thus translates the next words, What thy people shall do unto this people. But the Hebrew text and the LXX. are directly contrary unto this; being, as we translate the words, What this people shall do to thy people. Therefore Onkelos, to take in the foregoing sense, without altering the latter part of the verse, puts in one word, and makes the whole run thus: I will give thee counsel what to do, and (will shew thee) what this people shall do to thy people in the latter days. And the Jerusalem Targum more largely and plainly, I will advise thee what thou shalt do to this people; make them to sin: otherwise thou shalt not have dominion over them; but this people shall domineer over thy people in the latter end of days.

In the latter days.] In future ages. This shews the foregoing words do not speak of what Moab should do to Israel by his advice; for that was done as soon as he was gone.

Ver. 15. And he took up his parable and said, Balaam the son of Beor hath said, &c.] This was the preface to his foregoing prophecy: (see ver. 3.)

Ver. 16. He hath said, who heard the words of God, &c.] This verse also is the same with the fourth, only a few words added, And knew the knowledge of the Most High; which he adds, to shew his intimate acquaintance with the supreme Lord of the world. For he speaks of God in the very same style which Moses doth, calling him both El, and Schaddai, and Elijon, and Jehovah; which demonstrates that he was not a stranger to the true God, though corrupted with bad affections, and addicted also to foul superstitions.

Ver. 17. I shall see him.] Or, I do see him (for the future tense is often used for the present); that is, he saw the person of whom he was going to speak, represented to him in a vision.

But not now.] He saw him not as in being, now at present, but to come in future times.

I shall behold him, but not nigh.] The same thing in other words; but more plainly telling them, they must not expect this person in their time, nor in the next generation, but in remoter ages.

There shall come a Star out of Jacob.] A star denotes a great person; and being understood to be spoken of Christ, it denotes his celestial original. And both Onkelos, and Jonathan, and the Jerusalem Targum, take the Messiah to be here meant; and so doth R. Moses Haddarsan, and Bereschith Rabbath, and a great many Christian interpreters, (as Huetius observes, in his Demonstr. Evang. propos. vii. sect. 9.) particularly Eusebius and Cyril of Alexandria: who, in his eighth book against Julian, confutes his exposition of these words, which is this: Τοῦθ' ὅτι τῷ Δαβὶδ προσήκει, καὶ τοῖς ἀπ' ἐκείνου, πρόδηλόν ἐστί που· That this belongs to David, and to his successors, is sufficiently manifest. To which St. Cyril replies, that if Balaam had spoken of David, and the kings of Israel, he would have said, There shall arise stars out of Jacob, &c. whereas he speaks of one alone, οἷον ἐν ἄστροις ἐκπρεπῆ, as very illustrious among the stars; which, it is evident, can be none but Christ. Unto which I shall add the words of a later writer of the Jewish nation, R. Isaac, in his Illumin. Fidei, set forth not long ago by the learned Wagenseil: where he argues, this cannot be understood of David, or any other king of Israel, because none of them ever reigned all over the earth (i. e. over all the children of Sheth, whom none of them destroyed), but it is meant, he concludes, of the Messiah; who is compared to a star, because of the perennity of his kingdom, and the splendour of his dominion, and his great acts throughout the world, p. 72 and 80. where he makes this a prophecy of one kingdom alone to be in the world, viz. that of the Israelites, who are called "the people of the saints of the Most High," Dan. vii. 87. which is true enough, if he had understood the right meaning of Israelites; who are those, not after the flesh, but after the spirit.

It is not fit to conclude this without one observation more: that so long ago as the time of the Emperor Adrian, this was understood by the generality of the Jews to be a prophecy of the Messiah. For they followed one whose name was Chocab (i. e. a star), to whom the famous R. Akiba (a doctor, who, they say, had four-and-twenty thousand scholars) applied these words of Balaam, and calling him Barchocab, i. e. the son of a star, anointed him their king, and carried a sword before him, crying, Behold the very king Messiah! This is reported by the Jews themselves in Tzenach David, and several other books: all which, I think, doth not hinder, but that king David may be hereby signified in the first sense; though as a type of the Messiah, the great Son of David, in whom it was completed.

And a Sceptre shall rise out of Israel.] This some think may first have a respect to David, and then to the Messiah, the king of Israel. But the Chaldee paraphrast refers the whole to Christ, whose words are these, A King shall arise out of the house of Jacob, and the Messiah shall be anointed of the house of Israel. Nor is it any wonder that Balaam should prophesy of him so many years before he was born; and so plainly, that Moses himself doth not speak in plainer terms: but it is to be looked upon as the effect of God's infinite goodness, who would not have those, that were not of the seed of Abraham, to be wholly ignorant of what he intended to do for all mankind. And this was necessary to be plainly told them, because otherwise they would not have understood it.

And shall smite the corners of Moab.] The latter part of this prophecy, Huetius thinks, belongs to David, as the former part to Christ: which was the opinion of Maimonides, who divided the prophecy between them. And this was indeed literally fulfilled in David, who subdued the Moabites entirely, as we read 2 Sam. viii. 8. Psal. lx. 8. cviii. 9. Some translate these words, he shall smite through the princes of Moab. So the LXX. τοὺς ἀρχηγοὺς Μοάβ: which doth not alter the sense. And it is no unusual thing with the prophets, when they intend to speak of something nearer to them, to be transported by the Spirit of God, to speak of things a great deal more remote. As Balaam, here foretelling a great Ruler should come out of Jacob, first speaks of the greatest of all, above fourteen hundred years after this time; and then of David, who reigned about four hundred years after this.

And destroy all the children of Sheth.] They who interpret this of David, take Sheth to have been some great person in that country, or some place of great note, the inhabitants of which are here threatened to be destroyed. But these are mere conjectures, which have no foundation in history; whereas, if we understand it of Christ, and translate the first word, not he shall destroy, but (as Castalio and others do) he shall rule over, the sense is very remarkable; it being a prophecy, that, in the times of the Messiah, there shall be no longer such a distinction as God now made between the Israelites and other nations (by the peculiar laws he gave them at their entrance into Canaan), but all mankind, who are equally descended from Seth, shall be united under his government. And thus not only Lyranus, and Abulensis, and others interpret it, but Onkelos also, whose words are, "He shall have dominion over all the sons of men:" for he thought it reasonable, by the children of Sheth, to understand all mankind who were propagated from him, who succeeded in the place of Abel that was killed; all the seed of Cain perishing in the flood.

Ver. 18. And Edom shall be a possession.] So it was in the days of David, (2 Sam. viii. 14.)

And Seir shall be a possession.] This was a famous mount in the country of Edom, (Gen. xxxvi. 8.) and being the strongest part of the country, may signify here, that no place should be able to hold out, though never so strongly fortified by nature or art. And so we read they all became David's servants, 2 Sam. viii. 14. 1 Chron. xviii. 13.

For his enemies.] i. e. For the Israelites.

And Israel shall do valiantly.] For they subdued in those days many other countries; as we read in the forenamed chapters, (2 Sam. viii. 1 Chron. xviii.)

Ver. 19. Out of Jacob shall come he that shall have dominion.] This may relate to Christ as well as to David, in whom it was literally fulfilled. And so Baal-Hatturim observes, that (ver. 16.) it is said of Balaam, that he knew the mind of the Most High, for he prophesied of the Messiah, when he said, out of Jacob shall one come that shall have dominion. The word jerd, as the Masora notes, is used only here, and in Psalm lxxii. 8. where the Psalmist describes the universal kingdom of Christ in these words, "He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river unto the end of the earth."

And shall destroy him that remains in the city.] Not only rout them in the field, but take their defenced cities: and, it is likely, he particularly aims at some great city, and best fortified, which was the metropolis, and the strongest hold in the kingdom; such a one there was in Edom, as the Psalmist suggests, (Psalm lx. 9.)

Ver. 20. And when he looked on Amalek.] On the country which the Amalekites inhabited.

He took up his parable, and said.] See ver. 3.

Amalek was the first of the nations.] The most eminent among the neighbouring nations, or one of the most noble, as Bochart renders it, gens una è nobilissimis.

But his latter end shall be, that he perish for ever.] This God commanded Saul to execute, (1 Sam. xv. 3.) according to the doom passed upon them, after their fight with Israel, (Exod. xvii. 14. 16.) and he lost his kingdom for doing his work imperfectly; which the Vulgar Latin takes to be the meaning of the seventh verse of this chapter. Onkelos paraphrases the whole verse in this manner: "Amalek was the beginning of the wars with Israel, therefore his end shall be to perish for ever." The Jerusalem Targum more plainly, "The Amalekites were the first people that made war against Israel; and in the latter days they shall make war against them," &c.

Ver. 21. And he looked on the Kenites.] He standing now upon the top of Peor, which was, it is likely, the highest place of the country, (for which reason Balak brought him thither, after he had tried other high places, chap. xxiii. 28.) might see a great way, and possibly behold the very rocks wherein the Kenites dwelt. But what people are meant by this name, is not clearly evident: for there were a people called Kenites, who were part of the nation that inhabited the land of Canaan: (Gen. xv. 19.) these cannot be here intended; for they were too far off from this place. And as for the Kenites mentioned in Judges i. 16. iv. 11. who dwelt among the Israelites when they came into Canaan, they had as yet no fixed state, but were with them in the wilderness. Therefore, it is likely, they were some of the kindred of Jethro (originally derived from the same family that he was of), who remained in Midian; and adjoined so close to the country of the Amalekites, that they are said to dwell among them, (1 Sam. xv. 6.) For it is plain, the word Keni in Hebrew is the name of a people, not of a particular person; and there might be a great many of them; some in Canaan, others in Midian; and of these latter, some went with the Israelites into Canaan when they conquered it, and others remained still in their own country: they seem all to have been descended from one Ken, or Kain, mentioned Judges iv. 11. (as Scaliger conjectures in his Elenchus Trihæres. cap. 23.) Jethro's posterity being but one family of this people.

Strong is thy dwelling-place.] They were but a small people, who dwelt upon steep mountains.

And puttest thy nest in a rock.] This is but a further description of their country in other words: for nest signifies their habitation; only it seems to import that their dwelling was little, in craggy mountains, where they looked upon themselves as very safe and secure, the access to them being very difficult: and from hence, I suppose, they were called Shelamites (as both the Jerusalem Targum and Onkelos here term them, instead of Kenites), i. e. peaceable people; because nobody meddled with them, nor they with any body.

Ver. 22. And the Kenite shall be wasted.] By little and little diminished.

Until Asshur shall carry thee away captive.] Till at last they were all carried away by the Assyrians, when they overran Syria, (2 Kings xvi. 9.)

Ver. 23. And he took up his parable, and said.] Having rested awhile, he sighed, and said aloud, (see ver. 3.)

Alas! who shall live when God doeth this?] What miserable times will those be, when the Assyrians shall overrun a great part of the world! how few will escape their devastation! or, who would not desire rather to die, than live in those days?

But some, I observe, refer this not to what goes before, but to what follows; which relates to the desolations made by the following empires, especially the Roman.

Ver. 24. And ships shall come from the coast of Chittim.] Whether this prophecy hath respect (in the word Chittim) to the Greeks or to the Romans, or to both, it was plainly fulfilled, as the learned Huetius observes. But it must be noted, that not only St. Jerome, but Onkelos, and Jonathan, and the Jerusalem interpreter, and the Arabic, understand by Chittim the country of Italy, or some part thereof. And Bochartus proves, by many arguments, that the people of that country did descend from Chittim, (see Gen. x. 4.) Yet it is not likely that Chittim, being the son of Javan who peopled Greece, went so far at first from the rest of his brethren; but his children peopled some part thereabouts: from whence, in aftertimes, when they were increased, they sent colonies into Italy; particularly Macedonia is called by the name of Chittim, in the Book of Maccabees; (1 Mac. i. 1. viii. 5.) and therefore I take the Greeks under Alexander to be here intended in the first place, and then the Romans in the next; each of them fulfilling the several parts of this prophecy.

And shall afflict Asshur.] This was done by Alexander, who overthrew the Persian empire, which ruled over the Chaldeans and Assyrians. So Theodoret understands the word Chittim, to signify Alexander and his Macedonians, whose country was anciently called Μακέττια, as Hesychius tells us, they being a mixture (as Mr. Mede probably conjectures in his forty-eighth Discourse, p. 377.) of the sons of Madai and Chittim. The Romans, indeed, afterward overthrew the Greek empire, but we do not read that they made war against the Assyrians till the time of Trajan, who subdued them, and reduced them into a province, as Dio relates, (lib. lxviii.)

And shall afflict Eber.] This was done by the Romans, not by the Grecians. For we are to understand by Eber, the Hebrew nation, called the children of Eber, Gen. x. 21. So the LXX. translate it, τοὺς Ἑβραίους: the name of Hebrews being as plainly derived from Eber, as that of Jews from Judah. Now they were not afflicted by Alexander in his conquests, but rather kindly treated by him: and therefore this cannot be meant of the Greeks; unless we will think it fulfilled in the time of Antiochus, who descended indeed from the Macedonians, but did not come from that country; nor did he afflict them long, much less make them desolate, as the Romans, under Vespasian and Titus, did; which seems to be here intended.

And they also shall perish for ever.] This doth not refer to Eber, but to the nation that afflicted him, viz. the Roman empire; which he prophesies shall not always afflict others, but at last be utterly destroyed itself. Aben Ezra, indeed, refers it to the kingdom of the Seleucidæ, or the Greek empire: but R. Isaac, beforementioned, thinks the destruction of the Romans is intended in this prophecy; only he fancies it is to be accomplished by a Christ not yet come.

Ver. 25. And Balaam rose up, and went.] As Balak had commanded him, (ver. 11.)

And returned to his place.] Unto his country, viz. Mesopotamia. But he was detained by the Midianites in his passage thither; among whom he was slain, as we read in the thirty-first chapter: for men are said to do that which they design and endeavour to do, (Exod. viii. 18. Numb. xiv. 40.) If this be not the meaning, then, after he came to his own country, he returned to the Midianites, at their entreaty, or by his own inclination; and (either as he was going home, or when he came back) gave that impious counsel, which was executed not long after this, as we find in the next chapter: for that he was the author of it, we are assured by three Divine writers. (See 2 Pet. ii. 15. Jude, ver. 11. Revel. ii. 14.)

It is a strange exposition which Baal-Hatturim gives of his going to his place; that is, saith he, he went down into hell. But it may serve to confirm the common interpretation of that which is said of Judas, Acts i. 25.

And Balak also went his way.] To Kiriah-Huzoth, I suppose, mentioned chap. xxii. 39.

CHAP. XXV.

Ver. 1. AND Israel abode in Shittim.] A place in the plains of Moab, (where they lay, while the forementioned things were transacted, chap. xxii. 1.) called Abel-Shittim, chap. xxxiii. 49. but it is usual to cut off the former part of a place's name, for shortness' sake: as in this very book, (chap. xxxii. 38.) Baal-meon for Beth-Baal-meon, as it is called Josh. xiii. 17. and Hermon commonly for Baal-Hermon; and Nimrim for Beth-Nimrim. To which may be added, Salem for Jerusalem, (Psal. lxvi. 3.) This station was the last which the Israelites made, while they remained in the wilderness; in which the rest of the things that follow, to the end of the book of Deuteronomy, were done.

And the people began to commit whoredom.] Both bodily and spiritual; into which they fell not long after Balaam was gone from Balak: though not all the people fell into this guilt, but a great many of them; as appears from what follows, (ver. 4—6.)

With the daughters of Moab.] And of Midian also, as we learn from ver. 6. 17, 18. But those of Moab are here alone mentioned; because, it is likely, they began this wicked practice. I see no ground for what Greg. Nyssen saith, that the Israelites having vanquished the Moabites in a battle, fell in love with the captives which they had taken, being overcome by lust, when they had been victorious in war; as he speaks, lib. de Vita Mosis, p. 186. It is something more probable, that the prophecy of Balaam being spread abroad among the Moabites concerning the great blessings God designed to bestow upon the Israelites, particularly that of the Messiah, it might excite in the women of Moab a desire to have children by the men of Israel, that they might partake in their blessings; unto which they might think they had some title, being descended from the eldest daughter of Lot, the son of Abraham's brother. This might pass for truth, if it were not very evident from the following story, that the daughters of Moab exposed themselves, by Balaam's counsel, to the lust of the Israelites, that by this means they might seduce them to idolatry, and so make them lose the blessing intended for them. For that this was done by Balaam's advice, there is no doubt. (See chap. xxxi. 16.) And the Jews have also a conceit that he ever had been an enemy unto Israel, being one of Pharaoh's privy-council, who advised him to drown their children; as the tale is told in the Talmud, in the title Sanhedrin, cap. ult. But this is to make him to have been now of a greater age, than we have reason to believe (viz. two hundred and ten years old, according to their own computation), and quite contrary to what others of them say, that he lived but half his time, according to the Psalmist, (Psalm lv. 23.)

Ver. 2. And they.] That is, the daughters of Moab.

Called the people.] Invited them to a feast: for the ordinary charms unto idolatry, were good victuals and bad women.

Unto the sacrifices of their gods.] To eat of the sacrifices which had been offered to their gods, particularly to Baal-Peor. These feasts upon their sacrifices were very magnificent among the heathen, being accompanied with music and dancing, and sometimes pompous processions, which enticed youthful minds to partake of them. Here the Israelites, casting their eyes upon the daughters of Moab (which doubtless on this occasion appeared in the best dress and richest ornaments), were smitten with their beauty, and courted their enjoyment; who would not yield to this motion, but upon condition that they would first worship their gods: whereupon, pulling a little image of Peor out of their bosom, they presented it to the Israelites to kiss it, and desired them to eat of the sacrifices that had been offered to him. Thus the Jewish doctors tell the story. And indeed it hath been observed by the writers of the church, that women have been the most dangerous seducers of men from the true religion; being from the beginning the spreaders of the old heresies. For Simon Magus advanced his heresy, "Helenæ meretricis adjutus auxilio," being assisted by the help of the harlot Helena. Nicolaus of Antioch also, choros duxit fœmineos. The famous Marcion sent before him some Roman ladies to prepare his way. Apelles, Montanus, Arius, Donatus, did all take the same course; as St. Jerome shews in his book Adversus Pelagianos.

And the people did eat.] Which was an act of idolatry (as to eat of the Lord's sacrifices was an act of Divine worship), whereby they owned themselves the servants of the gods of Moab. (See Exod. xxxiv. 15.)

And bowed down to their gods.] This was still a more plain act of idolatrous worship, expressly forbidden by God in the second commandment.

Ver. 3. And Israel was joined unto Baal-Peor.] This seems to signify, that they were devoted to the service of this idol in great affection; with which they performed the forenamed actions. The Jews commonly take this Baal-Peor to have been no better than a Priapus; and the worship of him to have consisted in such obscene practices, or postures at least, as are not fit to be named. Particularly their great commentary upon Numbers saith, that the Israelites being unwilling to enjoy their women upon those terms, they told them they needed only to uncover their nakedness before Baal-Peor, which was all the worship required of them: unto which they easily submitted. This Maimonides relates for a truth, that his worship consisted in revealing their secret parts before him, (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 45.) But Solomon Jarchi goes further, making this worship to consist in actions as ridiculous as they were beastly. All which seems to me very unlikely; and so it doth to several men of great judgment, particularly Mr. Selden; who thinks, with great probability, that Peor (as I observed before, chap. xxiii. 28.) being the name of a mountain in the country of Moab, the temple of Baal stood upon it (by whom some understand Saturn, others the sun, which is most likely), and thence he was called Baal-Peor, because there he was especially worshipped; as Jupiter was called Olympius, because he was worshipped in a famous temple, which stood on the mountain Olympus. And every one knows, that anciently they chose the highest mountains, before all other places, for the Divine service; insomuch, that at Jerusalem the temple was set upon the hill of Sion, which the Psalmist saith God preferred before all other places, (Psal. lxxviii. 68.) Or Peor, perhaps, was the name of some great prince (as the same Mr. Selden conjectures), translated into the number of the gods: for the Psalmist saith, (Psal. cvi. 28.) that when they worshipped Baal-Peor, they ate the sacrifices of the dead; which seems to signify, that in him they worshipped some dead man, who perhaps was the first institutor of this worship, whatsoever it was. Another great man of our own nation hath said much to strengthen this opinion; having shewn at large, that the ancient heathens were wont to deify the souls of men, and canonize them after death; and these were called Baalim, being accounted an inferior sort of deities, who they fancied were ministers for them to their celestial gods. (See Mr. Mede, book iii. p. 724, &c.) Yet it must be acknowledged, that there are others of great note who take all for truth which the Jewish writers report concerning the filthy worship of Baal-Peor, and imagine that fornication was a part of it; as in future times it was both among the Greeks and Romans, in the worship of some of their gods. For what the Jews found then practised, they fancied was done in these early days; but it is observable, that the more ancient the books of the Jews are, which speak of this matter, the less they say of the impurities in the service of Baal-Peor. For example, the Jerusalem Talmud hath none of that lewd stuff in it, which Solomon Jarchi, upon this place, took out of the Babylonian; which was composed long after the former.

And the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel.] As appeared immediately, by the severe punishment he inflicted on them, both for their idolatry and for their fornication.

And the Lord said unto Moses, Take all the heads of the people, and hang them up.] The plain meaning seems to be, that he should take, i. e. cause to be apprehended, the heads of the people, i. e. the rulers of thousands and hundreds, and other principal persons in their tribes, who had been guilty of the foul idolatry beforementioned; and by hanging them up, put a stop to the people's lewdness, when they saw these great men made public examples of God's displeasure. For it is very likely, more of the princes of the people were guilty besides Zimri; especially if it be true, which the Samaritan Chronicle affirms, that the daughters of the chief men of Moab were sent finely dressed to allure the Israelites; and one of the king's daughters among the rest. But, though the LXX. and the Vulgar, and Symmachus, thus understand it, that he commanded the heads of the people to be hanged up; yet a great many other ancient translators, and many famous doctors, take the word otham (them whom he commanded to be hanged up) not to refer to the heads of the people, but to such as had joined themselves to Baal-Peor: and they interpret the foregoing words, as if he had bid him take unto him (i. e. to his assistance) the heads of the people, as they think he did, as is related in the next verse. The judges indeed, there mentioned, seem to be distinct from the heads of the people; and Moses did not take them to his assistance, but commanded them to do their duty. Yet it must be acknowledged that there is a great current of interpreters which runs the other way; as if Moses was commanded to order the judges to assemble and call before them such as were suspected; and having examined the fact, accordingly proceed against them, and punish such as had offended. Thus the Samaritan copy reads it expressly, and so Onkelos, and the paraphrast called Uziclides, and the Jerusalem Targum, and the Arabic translation of Saadia Gaon: and both the Talmudists and Karaites agree in this sense, as

Mr. Selden shews at large, lib. ii. de Synedriis, cap. 1. n. 10. and Joh. Coch upon the Gemara of the Sanhedrin, cap. 4. sect. 4. where he observes that Aben Ezra, and Solomon Jarchi thus interpret it, and takes the meaning to be certain, that the heads of the people should divide themselves into several courts of judgment, and examine who had committed idolatry; and after conviction cause them to be hanged. For there is great reason to think the constitution of judges, by Jethro's advice, continued all the time they were in the wilderness; who might easily find out the guilty in their several divisions.

Before the Lord.] i. e. Before the sanctuary; as men who had forsaken the worship of their God, and by his sentence were adjudged to die.

Against the sun.] Openly, that all the people might see, and fear to sin. So both R. Solomon and Aben Ezra expound it. For this was a peculiar mark of the Divine displeasure against idolaters and blasphemers, that they should be hanged up, and publicly exposed, after they had suffered death. For none were hanged alive among the Hebrews; but first stoned (which was the common punishment of the forenamed offenders), and then hanged up in the eyes of all; as R. Solomon expounds this phrase against the sun.

That the fierce anger of the Lord may be turned from Israel.] By their zeal to vindicate the Divine honour.

Ver. 5. And Moses said unto the judges of Israel.] Some take these for the seventy elders, mentioned chap. xi. 25.

Slay ye.] By hanging them up, as some understand it. But the Hebrew word imports killing with the sword; which they commanded their officers to do, with the assistance of such as abhorred the wickedness of their neighbours.

Every one his men.] The seventy elders, being appointed to be coadjutors to Moses in the government, made a division of the people, it is most likely, into so many districts: and each of them having the charge of one, all the people therein are called his men; of whom he was to give an account.

That were joined unto Baal-Peor.] Who were so well known, that there was no danger of slaying the innocent.

Ver. 6. And, behold.] This which follows is the more wonderful, if the judges had already begun to execute the foregoing command; and argues Zimri to have been very impudently wicked, who thought himself so great a man, that no judge durst meddle with him.

One of the children of Israel came and brought unto his brethren.] In the camp of Israel, or into the tent where his own family dwelt.

A Midianitish woman.] By which it appears that both nations, Moab and Midian, were in this plot against Israel.

In the sight of Moses.] A high contempt of his authority; and of God's also, whose servant Moses was.

And in the sight of all the congregation of the children of Israel.] This seems to be a further aggravation of his sin, that he was not content to go to the women who invited them, (ver. 2.) but brought one of them along with him into the camp of Israel; and this he did before the face of all the people, as well as of Moses; and that when they were mourning for this sin, as it here follows.

Who were weeping before the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] This shews, that though there were great numbers engaged in this defection, yet the generality of the people clave unto the Lord, and bewailed the wickedness of their brethren, most earnestly imploring God's mercy towards them.

Ver. 7. And when Phineas, the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron, the priest, &c.] A man of great authority, being next to the high-priest, whom he succeeded in his office, as he did Joshua (if we may believe some writers) in the government of all Israel.

He rose up.] His spirit (as St. Luke speaks of St. Paul) was stirred in him; and being inspired with a holy zeal was moved to do what follows.

From among the congregation.] Who were weeping at the door of the tabernacle; or rather, from among the judges with whom he was assembled, being one of them: so Jonathan; he rose up from the midst of the Sanhedrin. For, as Bonav. Cornel. Bertramus thinks, Eleazar, after the death of Aaron, appointed his son Phineas to be prince of the Levites; which he thinks appears, not only from his rising up here, from the midst of the judges of Israel, but from the embassy, wherein he was employed by Joshua, unto the Reubenites, &c. beyond Jordan, Josh. xxii. 14. and from 1 Chron. ix. 20. where he is said to be ruler over the Korahites; which signifies, he thinks, such a pre-eminence as Eleazar himself had over the Levites, while his father Aaron lived, (de Repub. Jud. cap. 15.) And indeed the Psalmist saith, that Phineas stood up and executed judgment, (Psal. cvi. 39.) which seems to import that he acted as a judge, but by an extraordinary motion: which made him kill the offenders with his own hands, without a judicial process against them.

And took a javelin in his hand.] Or a sword, as Josephus calls it; which he snatched out of the hand of Moses, as the tradition is in Pirke Eliezer, cap. 47.

Ver. 8. And he went after the man of Israel into the tent.] It is an unusual word in the Hebrew which we translate tent; importing a private, secret place like a cave, as kubba or kobba is thought to signify, which the Arabians call alcobba; from whence comes the word alcove; which signifies, as Bochart observes, "conclave camerati operis, quo lectus circumdatur:" a room of arched work, which incloses a bed in it. (See his Hierozoicon, par. i. p. ult.)

And thrust both of them through, the man of Israel, and the woman.] This he did, saith Philo, προστάξαντος Μωϋσέως, by the command of Moses; but should rather have said, by a Divine instigation; which he followed, when the rest of the judges were afraid (as some conceive) to meddle with so great a man as Zimri was. And upon this fact, the Jews ground that which they call the judgment of zeal, which authorized them, who were full of zeal, to punish such as blasphemed God, or profaned the temple, &c. in the presence of ten men of Israel, without a formal process against them. Thus Matthias killed a Jew who sacrificed after the manner of the Greeks; (1 Maccab. ii. 24.) and three hundred others were killed by their countrymen, as is related in the book commonly called the Third Book of Maccabees. And upon the pretence of such zeal, St. Stephen was stoned, and St. Paul intended to be killed, &c. as Grotius observes, (lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 20. sect. 9. and see Selden de Jure Nat. et Gent. lib. iv. cap. 4.) But this judgment (as they call it) seems not to be well grounded upon the fact of Phineas, who was a public person, and had an extraordinary motion, not to be imitated by private men; nor was it followed till the latter times of the state of that nation.

Through her belly.] The Vulgar hath it, through her secret parts. And so the Jews in Pirke Eliezer, (cap. 47.) and in other books, such as Pesikta and Siphri; where they make many miracles to have concurred in this fact; particularly, they say, that the relations of Zimri going to fall upon Phineas for killing their prince, the angel of the Lord smote them, and cut them off.

So the plague was stayed from the children of Israel.] It seems a pestilential disease (as Josephus calls it) swept away many of the offenders, who could not so speedily be punished by the judges: but it stopped immediately upon this pious act of Phineas.

Ver. 9. And those that died of the plague were twenty and four thousand.] There were but twenty and three thousand who died of the plague itself, as the apostle tells us, (1 Cor. x. 8.) but there were a thousand more taken off in the plague time, or during the plague, as the Hebrew words may be read: for, in the twenty and four thousand, Moses comprehends all those who were killed by the sword, in the day of the plague, (as the phrase is ver. 18.) whereas St. Paul reckons those only who died of the pestilence, as many have observed, particularly Bochartus, (lib. ii. Hieroz. cap. 34. par. i.) It is probable that from hence it was, that the author of the Samaritan Chronicle took up a conceit, that the king of Moab sent twenty-four thousand damsels to seduce the Israelites; as Hottinger reports his words, in his Smegma Orientale, (cap. 8. p. 448.)

Ver. 10. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] After the plague was stayed, it is likely, Moses went into the tabernacle to give God thanks for his mercy to his people; and then he spake to him what here follows.

Ver. 11. Phineas the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron the priest, hath turned my wrath away from the children of Israel.] Though they wept and mourned before the door of the tabernacle, yet that did not prevail so much for mercy as this heroic act of justice.

While he was zealous for my sake among them.] With a fervent and courageous affection vindicated the Divine honour, by a speedy punishment of those notorious offenders.

That I consumed not the children of Israel in my jealousy.] Did not proceed to destroy them by the pestilence, when I was so highly incensed against them. For it is observed by Herodotus himself in his Euterpe, that τῶν μεγάλων ἀδικημάτων μεγάλαι εἰσὶ καὶ τιμωρίαι παρὰ τοῦ Θεοῦ, for great crimes there are as great punishments sent from God; which is necessary for the public good: for unless, by such means, a stop be put to open impurities, to murders, and such-like crimes, not only all civil society will be overturned, but nations become so wicked, that they will be fit for nothing but to be rooted out, by the Divine vengeance, as the Canaanites were. Thus Cicero discourses, (Philip. viii.) "In corpore, si quid ejusmodi est, quod reliquo corpori noceat," &c. In the body, if there be any thing which hurts the rest of the body, it is necessary to cut it off, or to burn it, that some one member, rather than the whole body perish: and so it is in the body of the commonwealth: "ut totum salvum sit, quicquid est pestiferum amputetur;" that the whole may be preserved, let that which is infectious be lopped off.

Ver. 12. Wherefore say.] Unto Phineas, or unto all the people.

Behold, I give thee my covenant of peace.] The word peace, in Scripture, comprehends all manner of blessings: and therefore this is a solemn promise and engagement to make him and his family prosperous: the particular blessing which he entails upon him, following in the next verse. But some will have this to signify, that he should be the great reconciler of God to his people, and make peace between them hereafter, as he had done at present. Philo seems to think this and the priesthood to be two distinct things; when he saith, God crowned his piety διτταῖς δωρεαῖς, εἰρήνῃ καὶ ἱεροσύνῃ, with two gifts, peace and the priesthood. And the Jews make peace to consist in a long life of prosperity; which was fulfilled in Phineas's person, who lived till the latter times of the judges, (Judg. xxi. 28.) Pirke Eliezer interprets it, He gave him the life of this world, and of the next.

Ver. 13. And he shall have it, and his seed after him.] It shall continue in his family.

Even the covenant of an everlasting priesthood.] This is the particular happiness which God settled upon him and his posterity, as long as their state lasted; which was with some limitation, it appears by this, that after some successions in the line of Phineas, the priesthood came, for a time, into the family of Eli, who was descended from Ithamar the youngest son of Aaron: the reason of it is not mentioned in the Scripture; but some great sin, it is reasonable to suppose, provoked God to set aside the line of Eleazar for some years, till Eli's sons also became so wicked, that the priesthood was taken from them, and restored in the days of Solomon to the posterity of Phineas, with whom it continued as long as the priesthood lasted. What sin this was, and when committed, we do not know. Some of the Hebrew doctors are so bold as to say, it was because Phineas would not absolve Jephthah from his vow, as Mr. Selden observes, (lib. i. de Success. in Pontif. cap. 2.) But as there is no ground for this, and such-like fancies, which others of them have, so it is more probable that some of Phineas's successors offended, rather than he himself; his posterity for four generations holding the priesthood, before it was translated to Eli, as Josephus and others (mentioned by Selden in the place beforenamed) make account.

Ægidius Camartus, in his book de Rebus Eliæ, cap. 3. sect. 5. and Cornel. Bertram, cap. 15. de Repub. Jud. imagine, that in those confused times, none of the priests were found fit to administer the affairs of the nation, but Eli alone; and therefore he was appointed by God to it, as appears from 1 Sam. ii. 30. But L'Empereur, in his annotations upon Bertram, well observes, that it being the constant course of God's proceedings, to continue his mercies to the Israelites, according to his promise, while they were obedient, but to take them away when they became disobedient; it is highly reasonable to conclude there was some great offence given to God by some of the race of Phineas, which was the cause that they lost this dignity: but so constant was God to his promise, that he preserved his line in a continued succession of twelve persons, from Phineas to Azariah, who "executed the priest's office in the temple that Solomon built in Jerusalem," as we read 1 Chron. vi. 4. to the 10th: from which time, to the captivity of Babylon, there were nine more, as we read there in the following verses: and after the end of the captivity, unto the time of Antiochus Eupator, the Jews reckon fifteen more, the last of which, Onias, was killed by Lysias: and after him there were eight of the family of the Asmonæi; the last of which, Aristobulus, was killed by Herod, who after that made whom he pleased.

Because he was jealous for his God.] God, who searches the hearts, saw that this motion proceeded not from any private passion, but out of pure love and fervent affection to him, and from indignation to see his Divine Majesty so affronted. For zeal is a mixed affection of love and anger.

And made an atonement for the children of Israel.] Procured a pardon for all his brethren, αὐτοκελεύστω καὶ ἰθελουργῷ σπουδῇ (as Philo expresses it), by his uncommanded and spontaneous diligence to vindicate God's honour, flowing from his sincere devotion to God's service.

Ver. 14. Now the name of the Israelite that was slain, even that was slain with the Midianitish woman.] God would have his name stand upon record, partly to make it infamous, and partly to do honour to Phineas, who durst venture to set upon a man who had so great an interest in his tribe, as is mentioned in the next words.

Zimri, the son of Salu, a prince.] Not the chief of the whole tribe, but of a great family in that tribe.

Of a house among the Simeonites.] In the Hebrew the words are, of a house of a father. For the tribes were divided into families, and these into houses, every one of which had a head or chief, (see the first chapter of this book, ver. 2.) and Zimri was one of those principal persons, though not prince of all the Simeonites.

Ver. 15. And the name of the Midianitish woman that was slain was Cozbi, the daughter of Zur.] This is set down also, to shew how little Phineas feared the great men, either in Israel, or elsewhere: for Zur is reckoned afterward as one of the kings of Midian, (chap. xxxi. 8.) or princes, (Josh. xiii. 21.)

He was head over a people, and of a chief house in Midian.] The Hebrew word ummoth (which we translate people) signifies nations; so that if we translate these words exactly, they sound thus, he was head of nations, of a house of a father in Midian; that is, chief of divers families, who all sprung from the same father or original in that country.

Ver. 16. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] Some time after this, though not long, (as appears from chap. xxxi. 1, 2.) but a little before Moses's death.

Ver. 17. Vex the Midianites.] Among whom this pernicious contrivance was hatched: for Balak being so incensed against Balaam, that he bade him begone, in all haste, out of this country, (chap. xxiv. 11.) Balaam would not stay to propound unto him this mischievous advice which was in his head, but went to the Midianites, and there discovered it; which was the same thing, he knew, as if he had acquainted Balak with it, there being a great friendship between the two nations, (chap. xxxii. 4.) It is likely, also, that the Midianites were the first that advised Balaam should be sent for, which made their guilt the greater: but the Moabites did not escape, though (for Lot's sake, perhaps, Deut. ii. 9.) their punishment was deferred till future times, as Balaam prophesied, (chap. xxiv. 17.) and they were also excluded, by a law made immediately after this, from the society of the Israelites, for this very fact, (chap. xxiii. 3, 4.)

And smite them.] With the sword; as we find they did, chap. xxxi.

Ver. 18. For they vex you with their wiles.] Have sorely distressed you by their subtle devices.

Wherewith they have beguiled you, in the matter of Peor.] Drawn you in to commit foul idolatry. Here Peor, which was a mountain in Moab, where Baal had a temple, (as I observed, chap. xxiii. 28.) is used for the idol itself, which was there worshipped, being a contraction of Baal-Peor: and so it is chap. xxxi. 18. Josh. xxii. 17.

And in the matter of Cozbi.] And into lewd filthiness with idolatrous women.

The daughter of a prince of Midian.] By whose consent, no doubt, she went upon this wicked design; that, by her noble garb and attendance, she might the more powerfully entice the great men of Israel to idolatry.

Their sister.] Whom the whole family were content to prostitute, that they might compass the destruction of the Israelites: but by sister may be meant one of the same country or nation; the same kind of language being used among them that was among the Jews; who called one another brethren and sisters (being descended from the same stock), as Christians did all those that were of their religion.

Which was slain in the day of the plague.] When so many thousands fell by the pestilence.

For Peor's sake.] For worshipping Baal-Peor; into which they were inveigled by the women, who invited them to a feast, and there, by their charms, excited another fleshly appetite in them, which they would not let them satisfy, unless they would both eat of their sacrifices and worship their idol: and perhaps they told them it was not lawful for them to consent to their desire, unless they would be of their religion.

CHAP. XXVI.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass after the plague.] Mentioned in the foregoing chapter, ver. 9. 17. though some fancy it refers unto all the plagues that had swept away all the former generation, except two persons. It is likely this may be done in the eighth month of the fortieth year, after they came out of Egypt.

The Lord spake unto Moses, and unto Eleazar, the son of Aaron the priest, saying.] As God had formerly joined Aaron with Moses, (Numb. i. 1. 17. ii. 1. iv. 1, &c.) so now Aaron being dead, he joins his son Eleazar with him, to shew that he succeeded not only in his place and office, but also in his authority.

Ver. 2. Take the sum of all the congregation of the children of Israel.] They had been twice numbered before this; once, before the building of the tabernacle, in the first year after they came out of Egypt, when they paid every man half a shekel towards it, (Exod. xxx. 11. 13. xxxviii. 25.) and again, when they were to be encamped, in the second month of the second year, (Numb. i. 1, 2, &c.) And now, all those men who had been then numbered (thirty-eight years ago) being dead (as appears from ver. 64. of this chapter), God commands them to be numbered a third time; partly, that he might demonstrate his faithfulness to his word, in multiplying them vastly, notwithstanding all their provocations (for their number was within eighteen hundred and twenty as many as they were at the last muster), and partly that the land they were now going to possess, might be the more easily divided among the tribes in just and equal proportions.

From twenty years old and upwards, throughout their fathers' house, all that are able to go to war in Israel.] All this is explained in the first chapter, ver. 2, 3.

Ver. 3. And Moses and Eleazar the priest spake with them.] With the heads of the several tribes; who, it is likely, were to assist in this numbering, as they did in the former, (Numb. i. 4. 16, 17.)

In the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho, saying.] See chap. xxii. 1.

Ver. 4. Take the sum of the people.] These words are not in the Hebrew; but some words of this kind are to be understood, that they spake with them about numbering the people, from twenty years old and upwards, as it here follows.

As the Lord commanded Moses and the children of Israel, which went forth out of the land of Egypt.] He bade them proceed according to the directions God had formerly given, in the second month of the second year, after they came out of Egypt, (Numb. i. 1.)

Ver. 5, 6. Reuben, the eldest son of Jacob.] This numbering being performed as the former was, Moses uses more concise language in the account he gives of it; as he doth in the foregoing verse, and in this, and those that follow; where he sets down the number of every tribe, and the families from whence they sprung, without saying, Those that were numbered of the tribe of Reuben were, &c. as he doth, Numb. i. 21, &c.

The children of Hanoch, of whom came the family of the Hanochites, &c.] The four sons of Reuben (whose families here follow) are mentioned both in Genesis xlvi. 9. and in Exodus vi. 14. and are here mentioned again; because he intends to set down the names both of the children and grandchildren of one of his sons, which he did not before.

Ver. 7. These are the families of the Reubenites.] The word we translate families, rather signifies nations (gentes) or kindreds, as we translate it, Psal. xxii. 27. For all that sprung from those seventy persons who came with Jacob into Egypt, are called by this name of mispecoth, which the LXX. here translate δῆμοι, people; which were divided into houses, as the Hebrews call them, and those houses into particular persons: this is plain from Josh. vii. 14. where, for the discovery of him that had sinned in the accursed thing, God commanded the Israelites to be brought by their tribes, and then that tribe by the families belonging to it; and that family which the Lord took by households; and that household man by man.

And they that were numbered of them were forty and three thousand and seven hundred and thirty.] This being compared with Numb. i. 21. it appears this tribe was less than it was eight-and-thirty years ago, by near three thousand men: for some whole households had been destroyed, as it follows, ver. 9.

Ver. 8. And the sons of Pallu, Eliab.] He speaks in the plural number, when there was but one son of Pallu, which is very usual in the Scripture language: (see Gen. xix. 29. xxi. 7. xlvi. 7. and in this very chapter, ver. 42.)

Eliab.] He doth not say from him came the family of the Eliabites; for he made only a household in the family (as we call it) of the Palluites.

Ver. 9. And the sons of Eliab, Nemuel, and Dathan, and Abiram.] The same must be observed of these, that families did not spring from them; but they were households belonging to the family of the Palluites.

This is that Dathan and Abiram.] They are here again mentioned; partly to set a new brand upon them, for their insolent rebellion against Moses, and partly to shew how the Reubenites came to be so diminished.

Famous in the congregation.] See chap. xvi. 2.

Who strove against Moses, and against Aaron, in the company of Korah.] They joined with Korah, who seems to have been the chief incendiary; for he is mentioned first in chap. xvi. 1.

When they strove against the Lord.] Who had appointed Aaron alone to be the high-priest, and his sons to minister in the priest's office; which these men would have usurped, chap. xvi. 11. where it is said expressly, "they were gathered together against the Lord."

Ver. 10. And the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up together with Korah.] These words seem to import, that Korah was swallowed up with Dathan and Abiram, as I have observed upon chap. xvi. 32. (See there.) But it must be acknowledged, that these words may receive another interpretation, and that very natural, in this manner: The earth opened her mouth and swallowed them up, (viz. Dathan and Abiram, and the rest, mentioned chap. xvi. 32.) and then the next words, veeth Korah, may be thus translated, and as for Korah (who was the great incendiary) when that company died, i. e. he died when the company which offered incense died: for there is in many places a defect of a word, to be supplied from the word that follows. This is a very easy construction, and agrees with the Psalmist, Psal. cvi. 17. where he mentions only Dathan and Abiram's company as swallowed up; and then adds, (ver. 18.) "A fire was kindled in their company (i. e. in the other company of rebels), and the flame burnt up the wicked;" viz. Korah, and those that were with him.

What time the fire devoured two hundred and fifty men.] See chap. xvi. 35. If the interpretation now mentioned of the foregoing words be admitted, then Korah must be added to the number of the two hundred and fifty men; which Moses takes occasion to explain in this place.

And they became a sign.] A monument of God's displeasure against those that affront his ministers; to give warning unto all posterity not to follow their pernicious courses.

Ver. 11. Notwithstanding the children of Korah died not.] As those of Dathan and Abiram did; but their family continued famous in David's time: for perhaps they left their father, and departed from the tents of those wicked men; as Moses by God's command exhorted the congregation, (chap. xvi. 24. 26.) and they obeyed, (ver. 27.)

Ver. 12, 13. The sons of Simeon after their families, &c.] His sons are reckoned up here just as they are Gen. xlvi. 10. and Exod. vi. 15. only one of them, viz. Ohad, is here omitted; because, either he had no children, or his family was extinct before this time. The first of them also, viz. Nemuel, is there called Jemuel; and Jachin, in 1 Chron. iv. 24. is called Jarib; there being some reason, in process of time, for such alterations.

Ver. 14. These are the families of the Simeonites, twenty and two thousand and two hundred.] There was a wonderful decrease of this tribe in the space of thirty and eight years: for they were fewer by above thirty-seven thousand than they were at the last numbering. (See chap. i. 23.) Many of them, it is probable, being in the same crime with Zimri, and the plague falling most heavily upon this tribe, whom Moses in Deuteronomy xxxiii. doth not bless.

Ver. 15—17. And the children of Gad after their families.] They are reckoned here next to the Simeonites, because they lay encamped next to them, under the standard of Reuben, (Numb. ii. 10, 11, &c.)

Of Zephon the family of the Zephonites, &c.] They are reckoned up in the same manner, Gen. xlvi. 16. only he that is here called Zephon, is there called Ziphon; and Osni is there called Ezbon; and Arod called Arodi.

Ver. 18. These are the families of the children of Gad, according to those that were numbered of them, forty thousand and five hundred.] This tribe also was less by above five thousand than before, (chap. i. 25.)

Ver. 19. The sons of Judah, Er and Onan.] These were his eldest sons, but died without issue before the children of Israel went down into Egypt, as it here follows. (See Gen. xxxviii. 1, 2, &c.)

Ver. 20. And the sons of Judah after their families were, &c.] Now he reckons those of his sons who made families, which were three: as we read also Gen. xlvi. 12.

Ver. 21. And the sons of Pharez were Hezron, &c.] Here he numbers two of Judah's grandchildren, as he did one of Reuben's, ver. 6. only with this difference, that these two made families in Israel, which his grandson did not; they being substituted instead of Er and Onan, who died without children. Or rather, the family of Pharez growing very great, there was a subdivision made of it into the other families, who were all still Pharezites (for Pharez had no other children but these two, to make a family of that name), but called by these two names of Hezronites and Hamulites, because the Pharezites were grown too big to be one family, and therefore parted into two.

Ver. 22. These are the families of Judah, according to those that were numbered of them, threescore and sixteen thousand and five hundred.] This tribe was very numerous before, above all the rest; and now this new generation, which sprung up instead of the old (who were all destroyed except Caleb), exceeded them two thousand. So faithful was God to his promise, that this should be a most powerful tribe. (See Numb. i. 27.)

Ver. 23. The sons of Issachar after their families.] He and Zebulon are mentioned next, because they lay encamped together, under the standard of Judah. (See Numb. ii. 5—7.)

Of Tola, the family of the Tolaites.] A wonderful fruitful family, and very valiant: there being of this one family twenty-two thousand and six hundred men in the days of David, (1 Chron. vii. 2.)

Of Pua, the family of the Punites.] He is called Phuvah, Gen. xlvi. 13.

Ver. 24. Of Jashub.] Who is called Job in the same place.

Ver. 25. Threescore and four thousand and three hundred.] This tribe also was exceedingly increased; being near ten thousand more now than they were at their first numbering, (chap. i. 29. ii. 6.)

Ver. 26. Of the sons of Zebulun after their families.] There is no change in their names; which are the same, without any alteration, as when they went into Egypt, (Gen. xlvi. 14.)

Ver. 27. Those that were numbered of them, threescore thousand and five hundred.] This tribe likewise was increased above three thousand since the former numbering, (see chap. i. 31.) And so the whole camp of Judah was mightily augmented, as that of Reuben was diminished.

Ver. 28. The sons of Joseph after their families.] See Gen. xlvi. 20.

Ver. 29. Of the sons of Manasseh, of Machir, &c.] This was the only son; but those descended from him, by an usual manner of speaking, are called Manasseh's sons also, being his grandsons. Some think indeed that Manasseh had other sons, which they gather from Gen. l. 22. but, if he had, their families were extinct; but none but Machir and his posterity had any inheritance in the land of Canaan, Josh. xvii. 1, 2. where the grandchildren are called his children.

Machir begat Gilead, and of Gilead came the family of the Gileadites.] They were not a distinct family from the Machirites, but the very same; Machir having no son but Gilead. Therefore that family, which at first was called Machirites, was afterward called Gileadites; or it was indifferently called either by the one or the other.

Ver. 30. These are the sons of Gilead, of Jeezer.] Called Abiezer, Josh. xvii. 2.

The family of the Jeezerites, &c.] The posterity of Gilead grew so numerous, that his sons made families, and not only households: so that the name of Gileadites being too general to distinguish them all, they were called, at length, by the name of his sons.

Ver. 31, 32. Of Asriel, the family of the Asrielites, &c.] This, and all the rest that follow, are mentioned as the sons of Gilead; for each of whose children there was a lot in the land of Canaan, (Josh. xvii. 2.)

Ver. 33. And Zelophehad the son of Hepher had no sons, but daughters, &c.] Whose case is considered in the next, and in the last chapter of this book; where they are ordered to have an inheritance among their father's brethren, but to marry into their own tribe. And their posterity, I suppose, were called after their grandfather's name, Hepherites: for such a family there was, as Moses tells us in the foregoing verse.

Ver. 34. Numbered of them fifty-two thousand and seven hundred.] If this be compared with chap. i. 35. it will appear that this tribe was increased above twenty thousand: which is the greatest increase of any other; and made good the prophecy of Jacob concerning the children of Joseph, (Gen. xlix. 22.)

Ver. 35. These are the sons of Ephraim, after their families.] He is mentioned after Manasseh, because he was his younger brother: yet in their encampment, this tribe had the standard under which Manasseh marched, (Numb. ii. 18, &c.)

Of Shuthelah, the family of the Shuthelites, &c.] He is mentioned first also in 1 Chron. vii. 20. where the next son Becher is called Bered; and Tahan called Tahath. For time is wont to make great alterations in the names of persons and places.

Ver. 36. These are the sons of Shuthelah, of Eran, the family of the Eranites.] He had, it seems, but one son; whose children (after the usual manner of speaking before noted) were called the sons of Shuthelah; though they made a distinct family, under the name of Eranites.

Ver. 37. Those that were numbered of them, thirty-two thousand and five hundred.] Though this proved a very numerous tribe in future times, yet, for the present, they were fewer by eight thousand than they were in the former numbering, (chap. i. 33.) which makes Moses's prophecy, a little after this, the more remarkable, Deut. xxxiii. 17. where he makes the Ephraimites ten to one, in comparison with the Manassites.

Ver. 38. The sons of Benjamin, after their families.] This tribe also was under the standard of Ephraim, and therefore mentioned here together with him and Manasseh. When they went into Egypt, the sons of Benjamin were no less than ten, (Gen. xlvi. 21.) half of which either had no children, or they were all extinct before this time; for here are only five named.

Of Bela, the family of the Belaites, &c.] The two first, Bela and Ashbel, are there named as they are here: but the next, Ahiram, is there called Ehi, and in 1 Chron. viii. 1. Ahara; such an alteration doth time make in names.

Ver. 39. Of Shupham, &c.] He is called Muppim in Gen. xlvi. 21. and Hupham is there called Huppim.

Ver. 40. The sons of Bela were Ard and Naaman.] Though five of his sons were dead without issue, yet two of his grandsons, descended from his eldest son, made distinct families in Israel. And the son of one of them was called after the name of his uncle, the youngest son of Benjamin, (Gen. xlvi. 21.) whose name was Ard; and in 1 Chron. viii. 3. (by a small transposition of letters) is called Adar.

Ver. 41. There were numbered of them forty-five thousand and six hundred.] This tribe was grown to be ten thousand more than they were at the last numbering, (chap. i. 37.)

Ver. 42. These are the sons of Dan.] Thus he speaks, though he had but one. (See ver. 8.)

Of Shuham.] Called Hushim, by a transposition of letters, Gen. xlvi. 23. Just as the same tree is called almugim, 1 Kings x. 8. and almugim, 2 Chron. ii. 8. And the same city in which Joshua was buried, called Timnath-Serach, Josh. xxiv. 30. and Timnath-Cheres, Judg. ii. 9. And, to come still nearer, the same man is called Rechum, Nehem. xii. 3. and Cherim, ver. 15. of the same chapter.

These are the families of Dan, after their families.] That is, from these Shuhamites came all the rest of the families of this tribe, which are not here mentioned; but into which this family was subdivided when it grew very great, as it appears from the next words.

Ver. 43. All the families of the Shuhamites.] This shews there were more than one of them who had names from some of the children of Shuham.

Were threescore and four thousand and four hundred.] A vast number to spring from one man; when Benjamin, who had ten sons, wanted almost twenty thousand of this number: which is seventeen hundred more than were in this tribe at the last numbering, (chap. i. 39.)

Ver. 44. Of the children of Asher after their families, &c.] They all retain the same names which they had when they went into Egypt, (Gen. xlvi. 17.) Only he that is here called Jeshui, is there called Ishui; and another son there mentioned is here omitted; his family, I suppose, being quite extinct.

Ver. 45. Of the sons of Beriah, &c.] Instead of him, whose family was quite lost, the youngest son of Asher (Beriah) had two families sprung from him.

Ver. 46. And the name of the daughter of Asher was Sarah.] Or Serah, as she is called, Gen. xlvi. 17. He doth not say that a family sprang from her, which Corn. Bertramus (cap. 6. de Republ. Jud.) seems to think probable, instead of some that were lost; but she was a woman, it is likely, as eminent in this tribe as any of her brethren for some virtue or other: insomuch, that the cabalists, in the ancient book Zohar, parting the heavenly region, where the souls of holy women are, into four palaces, make four great women to be a kind of presidents of them, viz. Pharaoh's daughter, who educated Moses; and this Serah, the daughter of Asher; with Jochabed, the mother of Moses; and Deborah, the famous prophetess. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 4.)

Ver. 47. Were fifty and three thousand and four hundred.] This tribe also fructified exceedingly, wanting but a hundred of twelve thousand more than they were at the last numbering, (chap. i. 41.)

Ver. 48, 49. Of the sons of Naphtali, after their families, &c.] There are four of them whose names were not at all changed since they went into Egypt. (See Gen. xlvi. 24.)

Ver. 50. Were forty-five thousand and four hundred.] They wanted eight thousand of their number, (Numb. i. 43.) These two tribes, Asher and Naphtali, are mentioned together with Dan, because they were encamped under his standard, (Numb. ii. 25, 26, &c.)

Ver. 51. These were the numbered of the children of Israel, six hundred thousand and a thousand seven hundred and fifty.] That is, the whole number amounted to this sum; which was but eighteen hundred and twenty less than they were when they were last numbered, thirty-eight years ago, (chap. i. 46.) So great was the goodness of God, and such his faithfulness to his word, that, when he destroyed all the former generation (who were above twenty years old), he multiplied their posterity so fast, in that space of time, as to make them equal, in a manner, to those that went before them.

Ver. 52. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] After the people were thus numbered, and every family, and the persons it contained, exactly known, then the Lord ordered as follows.

Ver. 53. Unto these.] i. e. These families beforenamed.

The land shall be divided.] i. e. The land of Canaan, into which they were going.

For an inheritance.] Not to be alienated from those families.

According to the number of names.] Of the persons in the several families, from twenty years old and upwards, (ver. 2.) So that minors, who had not attained the age of twenty years when this account was taken, the Jews say, were not to have any share in the land, though they were come to that age at the time of the distribution of it among them. But those minors had possessions, as heirs of their fathers, according to the families.

Ver. 54. To many thou shalt give the more inheritance, and to few thou shalt give the less inheritance.] That is, order Joshua to assign them a share in the land, proportionable to the number of persons in every tribe: some of which were far greater than others, and therefore to have more land, proportionable to the largeness of their families. But this was not measured merely by the number of acres, as we speak, but by the goodness of the soil: for a little ground, in a rich country, would maintain more persons than twice as much in a barren. So Josephus, lib. v. Antiq. cap. 1. where, after he had said that Joshua made a distribution of the land, κατὰ μεγέθους ἑκάστης τῶν φυλῶν, according to the bigness of each tribe; he adds, that in doing this, τιμητοὺς μᾶλλον ἢ μετρητοὺς τοὺς κλήρους εἶναι δεῖν, it was necessary to consider rather the value than the measure of every portion; and gives this reason why the tribe of Benjamin had so narrow a portion allotted them, because the ground was so very fertile about Jerusalem. Στενότατος ὁ κλῆρος οὗτος διὰ τὴν τῆς γῆς ἀρετὴν, This lot was very strait, because of the goodness of the soil.

To every man shall his inheritance be given.] That is, to every family.

According to those that were numbered of him.] According to the account that had been now taken; not considering who might be born after this (and thereby increase a family), or die (and thereby diminish it) before the division of the land was made. For several died, we may well think, in the wars with the Canaanites, and others were born before the country was conquered.

Ver. 55. Notwithstanding the land shall be divided by lot.] When it was divided into so many equal shares as there were tribes (a due respect being had to their number), they were not to choose which share they would have; but that was to be determined by lot. The manner of which they say was this: two urns being placed before him that drew the lots, in one of which were scrolls of parchment, containing the names of the twelve tribes of Israel, and in the other, the portions of land; he first put in his hand into the urn wherein were their names, and drew out one, suppose that of Judah; and then he put his hand into the other urn, and drew out the portion that fell to his share. Or, perhaps, there was only one urn, wherein were the several portions of land; and they began suppose with the eldest son of Israel, viz. Reuben; and pulling out a scroll, said, This is the portion of Reuben: and so with the rest. But which soever way they proceeded there were two distributions made, one of the whole country into twelve parts; and another of each of those parts among the several families that were in each tribe. (See Selden de Successionibus ad Leges Hebr. cap. 21, 22.)

According to the names of the tribes of their families they shall inherit.] This seems to justify what I now said, that they first named the tribe whose lot they would draw out; and that contained his inheritance. But, after all this, it might happen that some of their lots were too scanty for their number, and others too large: in which case Eleazar, and Joshua, and the rest appointed for this office, (chap. xxxiv. 17, &c.) ordered some portion to be taken from those who had too much, and given to those who had too little for their families. This appears from Josh. xix. 9. where a portion out of the lot of Judah is ordered for Simeon; because the one was too large, and the other too small: and the same may be said of Dan, ver. 47.

Ver. 56. According to the lot shall the possession be divided.] The first words, which we translate according to the lot, being, in the Hebrew, al pi hagoral, which literally signify according to the mouth of the lot (which is no more than, as the lot shall declare), the Jews have a conceit, that the land was divided, not merely by lot, but by urim and thummim, which Eleazar the priest then put on (as the Talmud describes it in Bava Bathra); and two urns standing before him, in one of which were the names of the twelve tribes, and in the other the names of the portions of land, he looked by the Holy Ghost upon the urim and thummim, and said, Let such a tribe come up; which being done, he said again, Let such a portion of land come up for this tribe: by which means all the people (before whom this was done) were satisfied that their portion was allotted to them by God; and all cause of murmuring and contention taken away. Thus R. Solomon and others mentioned by Buxtorf in his Hist. Urim et Thummim, cap. 3. and Martinius Mauritius in his late treatise de Sortitione veter. Hebr. cap. 29. sect. 4, 5. where he observes, how ancient the way of dividing goods and lands by lot was in other countries. But there was no need of this solemnity; the division of the land by God's order, after the manner of lots, sufficiently shewing, it was not by man's directions but by God's that such a share fell to them.

Between many and few.] Every tribe having its land assigned them by the lot, it was then divided among the several families, in the same manner (as these words seem to signify), and then every household had their share allotted them; according to the number of persons that were in them; which if they were many, had a greater share; if few, a less. By which means every man had reason to rest satisfied, because such was his lot; that is, such was the good pleasure of God, who directed the lots; as we learn from Joshua xviii. 6. 8. 10. where we read expressly, that in the division of the land, he "cast lots for them before the Lord in Shiloh," that he might order every one his portion.

Ver. 57. And these are they that were numbered of the Levites, after their families.] It was fit an account should be taken of this tribe also, that it might be seen how God had blessed them, as well as the rest of the tribes of Israel, with a numerous issue; though he had cut off, in the space of thirty-eight years, all the former generation, from twenty years old and upward.

Of Gershon, the family of the Gershonites, &c.] The principal families in this tribe were three, descended from the three sons of Levi, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari; whose names were not at all altered since their coming out of Egypt until this time, (Gen. xlvi. 11. Exod. vi. 16.)

Ver. 58. These are the families of the Levites.] The three forenamed were the principal families, divided into those lesser families which here follow.

The family of the Libnites.] Descended from Libni the eldest son of Gershon; who had another son, whose family is here omitted (viz. Shimi), though mentioned Exod. vi. 17. But in this place Moses doth not give a full account of all the families of the Levites, nor is it given in exact order, because they were to have no inheritance in the division of the land; which was the reason that all the families of the other tribes are set down so punctually.

The family of the Hebronites.] From Hebron, one of the sons of Kohath, (Exod. vi. 18. Numb. iii. 19.)

The family of the Mahlites, the family of the Mushites.]

From the two sons of Merari, who were called Mahli, and Mushi, (Exod. vi. 19. Numb. iii. 20.)

The family of the Korathites.] From the great-grandchild of Levi, (Exod. vi. 21. Numb. xvi. 1.)

And Kohath begat Amram.] Who was grandchild of Levi, and brother to the father of Korah, (Exod. vi. 18.)

Ver. 59. And the name of Amram's wife was Jochabed, the daughter of Levi.] See Exod. vi. 20.

Whom her mother (viz. Levi's wife) bare to Levi in Egypt.] See this there explained.

And she bare unto Amram, Aaron and Moses, and Miriam their sister.] Who was born before Moses, if not before Aaron, (Exod. ii. 4.)

Ver. 60. And unto Aaron was born Nadab and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar.] See Exod. vi. 23. where he tells the name of their mother.

Ver. 61. And Nadab and Abihu died, when they offered strange fire before the Lord.] See Lev. x. 2. and the third chapter of this book, ver. 4. But Eleazar (who was the eldest next to them) was now alive, and made high-priest; and it is likely Ithamar also, being under twenty years old, when the people murmured upon the report of the spies; and so not cut off with that wicked generation, (chap. xvi. 29.)

All this is here recounted, to shew that the tribe of Levi was preserved, by the blessing of God, as well as the rest of the Israelites; though they were to have no inheritance in the land of Canaan.

Ver. 62. And those that were numbered of them, were twenty and three thousand, &c.] So they were a thousand more than at the last numbering, (chap. iii. 39.)

For they were not numbered among the children of Israel.] But by themselves, for the reason following.

Because there was no inheritance given them among the children of Israel.] For God was their inheritance, as he told them, chap. xviii. 20, &c. And therefore they were ordered not to be numbered thirty-eight years ago, no more than now, (Numb. i. 49, &c.) The Jews are something curious in their observations upon these words, among (or in the midst of) the children of Israel: from whence they conclude, that the Levites might have lands out of the bounds of the land of Canaan, though not within it, among their brethren.

Ver. 63. These are they that were numbered by Moses and Eleazar the priest, who numbered the children of Israel in the plains of Moab, &c.] By a special command of God, (ver. 1, 2, &c.)

Ver. 64. But among these there was not a man of them whom Moses and Aaron the priest numbered, when they numbered the children of Israel in the wilderness of Sinai.] See the first chapter of this book, ver. 1, 2, &c. so exactly were God's threatenings fulfilled, as well as his promises.

Ver. 65. For the Lord had said of them, They shall surely die in the wilderness.] He had pronounced this irreversible sentence upon the whole congregation, chap. xiv. 23. 28, 29. where he swears they should not enter into the land of Canaan, because they had brought or entertained an evil report of it. (See also Deut. ii. 14, 15.)

And there was not a man left of them, save Caleb the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua the son of Nun.] Whom God promised to spare, because they were of another spirit, (chap. xv. 24. 30. 38.) And their survival was as remarkable an instance of the truth of God's word, as the death of all the rest.

CHAP. XXVII.

Ver. 1. THEN came the daughters of Zelophehad, the son of Hepher, &c.] Who are mentioned before, (chap. xxvi. 33.) just as they are here; only their genealogy is here more fully set out, that their father was the grandson of Manasseh the son of Joseph, from whom he was lineally descended, but left no sons behind him. Now these young women hearing Moses say (as he doth in the foregoing chapter), that the Lord commanded the land of Canaan should be divided among those that were now numbered; and observing that only males from twenty years old were numbered, (ver. 2.) presently apprehended, that they, being females, were excluded from having any inheritance among the Israelites, (and so the family of the Hepherites, chap. xxvi. 32. would be extinguished.) This was the ground of what follows: whereby it appears, that every body was immediately acquainted with the laws which Moses received from God; and that there was a faithful register kept of every one that was born in every family and tribe, to prevent all disputes about the true heirs to men's estates.

Ver. 2. And they stood before Moses, &c.] To represent before him, and the rest of the judges, who were now assembled, the case which I have mentioned.

Before Moses, and Eleazar the priest, and before the princes, and all the congregation.] These made up the greatest court of judicature that at any time sat. For by princes are meant, either the heads of the tribes, or the highest of the judges appointed Exod. xviii. called the heads of the people, ver. 25. And by all the congregation is meant the seventy elders mentioned in this book, (chap. xi. 24.) For they are called col ha edah (the whole congregation, and sometimes only edah, the congregation), as R. Solomon observes: (see Bertram de Republ. Jud. p. 72.) Now at the head of all these sat Moses, and next to him Eleazar the priest.

By the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] Near to which this august assembly, it is likely, was wont to sit when they met together; that Moses might presently, if there were occasion, go and consult with God himself in any difficult matter that came before them. And thus Mr. Selden observes, out of Maimonides, that in future times the great Sanhedrin followed the tabernacle, sitting sometimes in one place, sometimes in another, according as that was settled. As (after they came to Canaan) it was first at Shiloh, then at Mizpeh, and afterward at Gilgal, Nob, Gibeon, the house of Obed-Edom; till at last it was fixed in Jerusalem, (lib. ii. de Syned. cap. 15. n. 4.) As concerning that which the Talmudists say, concerning the proceedings in this case of Zelophehad's daughters, nothing certain can be determined. But they give this account of it: that they first brought this cause into the courts appointed by the advice of Jethro, (Exod. xviii. 21.) and began with the rulers of ten, who knowing not what to say to them, they went to those of fifty, and from thence to the centurions, and at last to the chiliarchs: none of which durst adventure to give judgment, but referred the cause, by reason of its difficulty, to Moses; who brought it to the Schechinah, as they speak, i. e. to the Divine Majesty, (Seld. ib. cap. 16. n. 1.)

Ver. 3. Saying, Our father died in the wilderness.] Among the rest mentioned ver. 64, 65. of the foregoing chapter. They seem to have drawn up their cause in the form of a petition; or, as Mr. Selden speaks, in the legal phrase, presented a libel to the court, containing the entire matter of their petition, and that artificially enough.

And he was not one of them that gathered themselves together against the Lord in the company of Korah.] They use the very words of Moses concerning that rebellious company, (chap. xvi. 11.) and instance in this sin, rather than any other; either to shew that their father had a due regard to the authority of Moses (who they hoped therefore would be the more favourable to his posterity), or rather, to insinuate, that he was not guilty of such a crime, as might make men justly forfeit what they had for their children, as well as for themselves. For all the family of Dathan and Abiram perished: and it is taken notice of as a singular mercy, that the children of Korah did not, (chap. xxvi. 10, 11.)

But died in his own sin.] i. e. For his own sin: which God had declared should not affect the children, (chap. xiv. 31.) For to that general sin, in which all the people were engaged, these words seem to refer. And so it was his own sin, not with respect to the rest of the people (for they were all alike guilty), but with respect to his children; it being a personal guilt, in which they were not concerned.

The Jews commonly say that Zelophehad was the man that was stoned for gathering sticks on the sabbath-day: for which they have no authority, but a fancy of R. Aquiba, who is sharply reproved for it by another considerable rabbi, who saith it is a rash judgment; for if it were true, since the Scripture conceals it, he ought not to have revealed it: but hath reproached a just man, for any thing that appears. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 1. sect. 2.)

And had no son.] As was found when the people were numbered, (chap. xxvi. 33.)

Ver. 4. Why should the name of our father be done away from among his family.] One family of the tribe of Manasseh, viz. the Hepherites, being in danger to be wholly extinguished. R. Judah will have the word name in this place to signify as much as hereditary possession; and so he thinks it signifies, Deut. xxv. 6. as Mr. Selden observes out of Pesikta, (lib. de Successionibus, cap. 14.)

Because he hath no son.] Merely for want of issue-male, when he hath left many daughters.

Give unto us therefore a possession among the brethren of our father.] Let us come in for a share among those that are descended from Manasseh: which if they did, the name of their father could not be thereby preserved, but by the son of one of these daughters taking upon him, not the name of his father that begat him, but of his mother's grandfather, viz. Hepher; which was ordered afterward by a general law, (Deut. xxv. 6.)

Ver. 5. And Moses brought their cause before the Lord.] This was too difficult a cause (though there seemed to be a great deal of reason on their side) to be judged by the great court beforementioned; and therefore it was referred to Moses alone, as other weighty causes used to be: (see chap. xv. 32. xxv. 4.) for neither Eleazar, nor any other person, (before whom it was brought, ver. 2.) are here mentioned as the judges of this matter. And he durst not judge it, though the equity appeared very plain, without bringing it before the Lord for his direction, which he could have upon all important occasions, (Exod. xxv. 22. Numb. vii. 89.)

Ver. 6. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] This shews that the cause was devolved upon Moses alone; for the Lord tells him, and no other person, how it should be determined.

Ver. 7. The daughters of Zelophehad, &c.] The Lord approves of their claim, and gives a sentence in their favour.

Thou shalt surely give them a possession of an inheritance among their father's brethren.] Because the word from them in the Hebrew is of the masculine gender, some think it signifies, they were to be considered as if they had been sons.

And thou shalt cause the inheritance of their father to pass unto them.] So that they were to enjoy what would have fallen to his share had he been alive; "ob indutam defuncti patris personam," as the lawyers speak; because they stood in the place of their dead father, and represented his person. And accordingly they put in their claim at the division of the land, and had their portion therein, according to this decision, (Josh. xvii. 2, 3, &c.) How the portion was divided among them, according to the Hebrew doctors, Mr. Selden shews at large in his book de Successionibus in bona defuncti, cap. 23.

Ver. 8. And thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel, saying.] Upon this occasion he passes this special case into a general law, to be hereafter observed.

If a man die, and have no son, then ye shall cause his inheritance to pass unto his daughter.] It being but reason, as Maimonides observes, (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 42.) that what a man leaves should come to his family, and to those who are next of kin to him: for the nearer any person is to us, we are inclined, by natural affection, to have the greater regard to him. But all this is to be understood of land: as for money, and moveable goods (which were of his own getting), the father might dispose of them, by his will, to whom he pleased.

Ver. 9. And if he have no daughter, then ye shall give his inheritance unto his brethren.] Unless his father was alive, who, undoubtedly, the Jews say, was the next heir; but not mentioned, because it was not necessary; or, as some say, because it was too sad a thing to speak of a father's burying all his children without issue. See Selden, de Succes. in bona defuncti, cap. 12. where he observes, that, according to the rule, ver. 11. it must come to the father, because he is nearest of kin to it. And therefore the Jews interpret this, as if Moses had said, If he have no daughter, ye shall give inheritance to the next of his kindred (to his father for instance), and afterward ye shall give it to his brethren, i. e. the children of his father. And the same is to be said of the grandchildren; unto whom the brethren of a father dying without issue are heirs. For the grandfather stands in the same relation to a father that a father doth to his son.

Ver. 11. And if his father have no brethren, then ye shall give it to his kinsman that is next of kin to him of his family, and he shall possess it.] To his brother's children, or to those who are descended from them, or from his father's brethren. But no consideration was to be had of his mother's kindred (as the Jewish lawyers say), who could never be capable of the inheritance: which they gather, not only from these words, which determine the inheritance to his family (i. e. the family of the father beforementioned, not to the family of the mother), but from the frequent mention of the father of Mischpachoth, which we translate families, or rather kindreds of the fathers, in the books of Moses, Chronicles, Ezra, and others. From whence this solemn maxim of the Talmudists, The family or kindred of the mother, is never called by the name of kindred: that is, it hath not the effect of a kindred in successions to inheritances. Which is the same with that in the ancient book Siphri, Families follow the fathers; as Mr. Selden observes in the place beforementioned; who in the next chapter (cap. 13.) gives an example, drawn up by Maimonides, of such a succession out of the Holy Scriptures. Amram had two sons, Aaron and Moses, as we read Exod. vi. 20. If they had both died without issue, Miriam their sister had inherited. And if she had died in like manner, the inheritance of the family would have reverted to Kohath, the father of Amram: or he being dead, to his three sons, the brethren of Amram, viz. Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel, as the heirs of Kohath. And there would have been no consideration of primogeniture; both because none of them was the first-born, and because the inheritance was not in the possession of their father, at the time of his death, &c.

And it shall be unto the children of Israel a statute of judgment, &c.] A law whereby to determine such matters in future times, and to be observed inviolably: so that no father should have power to make any other settlement; but if either by word or writing he declared his will to be that his son should not inherit, his act was null and void: as the Jewish lawyers resolve from these very words, a statute or decree of judgment, i. e. as I said, a rule whereby to judge of succession into inheritances. If therefore a man made a will, wherein he declared his daughter or brethren, &c. should not inherit, in case he had no son, it was void, because contrary to this law. (See Selden de Successionibus, cap. 24.)

Ver. 12. And the Lord said unto Moses, Get thee up into this mountain Abarim.] Either these words were spoken after all that follows here, and in the book of Deuteronomy, or they were repeated again, when he had repeated his laws, and enforced them by many excellent discourses, and taught them that famous song, Deut. xxxii. where, in the conclusion of it, (ver. 49.) it is said, that very day he bade him go up this mount Abarim. And there we learn also that Abarim was a long tract of mountains, one of which was called Nebo; and the very top of it called Pisgah. (See Deut. xxxiv. 1.)

And see the land which I have given to the children of Israel.] Take a full view of it, as he did from that high neighbouring mountain, (Deut. iii. 17. xxxiv. 1—4.)

Ver. 13. And when thou hast seen it, thou also shalt be gathered unto thy people, as Aaron thy brother was gathered.] Upon Mount Hor, as we read in this book, chap. xx. 23, 24.

Ver. 14. For ye rebelled against my commandment in the desert of Zin, &c.] See chap. xx. 1. 12. 24. where all this verse is explained.

Ver. 15. And Moses spake unto the Lord, saying.] He did not speak those words which follow, immediately after God bade him go up Mount Abarim and die; but first desired he might be permitted to go over Jordan, &c. (Deut. iii. 24—26.) Unless we can think that he made the prayer there mentioned, as soon as the sentence was passed upon him, at the waters of Meribah, which doth seem not so likely.

Ver. 16. Let the Lord, the God of the spirits of all flesh, &c.] As soon as he found that God was resolved he should not conduct the people into Canaan, he was concerned for nothing, but for a fitting person to take that charge upon him. For he had a most generous public spirit, wholly intent upon the good of this people.

The God of the spirits of all flesh.] Who hast not only made the souls of all men, but knowest their dispositions, (see chap. xvi. 22.) and understandest who are fit for this weighty employment.

Set a man over the congregation.] To be chief ruler and governor of the people in my place.

Ver. 17. Which may go out before them, and which may come in before them, and which may lead them out, and which may bring them in.] If the latter part of these words be not a mere repetition of the former (as is usual), then the one relates to the conduct of war, and the other to the management of all their civil affairs. And both of them seem to be a metaphor from shepherds watching over their flocks.

That the congregation of the Lord be not as sheep which have no shepherd.] Having none to govern and to take care of them. This is a description of the most miserable condition a people can be in, and became a proverb among the Hebrews, (1 Kings xxii. 17. Zach. x. 2. xiii. 7. Matt. ix. 36.)

Ver. 18. And the Lord said unto Moses, Take thee Joshua the son of Nun.] Who had been a long time servant unto Moses, and attended upon his person, (Exod. xxiv. 13.) well known to Moses, and perfectly acquainted with his administration.

A man in whom is the spirit.] Of courage and prudence, and the fear of God, with all other gifts necessary in an excellent governor: among which Onkelos reckons the spirit of prophecy; which is not unlikely.

And lay thine hand upon him.] Which was a ceremony usual in blessing, (Gen. xlviii. 14, &c.) and in setting men apart, and consecrating them to an office, (chap. viii. 10.) Upon which followed a more abundant measure of the spirit, as appears from Deut. xxxiv. 9.

Ver. 19. And set him before Eleazar the priest, and before all the congregation.] Being all assembled for this purpose, that all might acknowledge him for the designed successor of Moses, and be witnesses of all that Moses commanded him.

And give him a charge in their sight.] He told him before them all what God expected from him; and bade him be not afraid to execute it. See Deut. xxxi. 7, 8. where he sets down the words of this charge; unto which God presently after added one of his own, (ver. 14, 15. 23.)

Ver. 20. And thou shalt put some of thy honour upon him.] Communicate some of thy authority to him at present; and not let him be any longer as thy minister, but as an associate in the government. The word we translate honour being glory in the Hebrew, it made Onkelos and other

Hebrew doctors imagine these words have respect to that splendour which shone in Moses's face, after he came down from the mount: some of which they suppose was imparted unto Joshua, to make him appear more venerable in the eyes of the people. And R. Menachem observes, that it is not said, impart thy glory, but of thy glory to him. From whence came that ancient saying, The face of Moses shone like the sun, but Joshua's only like the moon. This might have passed for truth, or at least that hereby was meant some great increase of illustrious gifts of mind, which procured him such reverence as Moses had, if it had been said that God put some of Moses's glory upon him; whereas Moses is commanded to do it; which makes the first sense most reasonable.

That all the congregation of Israel may be obedient.] That the people may begin to submit to his authority, and learn to obey his commands, as well as thine.

Ver. 21. And he shall stand before Eleazar the priest, &c.] For the encouragement of Joshua to undertake this charge, he assures him he shall never want direction from God what to do when he was in any doubt; but, in the manner he prescribed, most certainly receive it. And what is here said concerning him, belongs to all their succeeding governors. And it is observed by Maimonides, and other Jewish doctors, that the high-priest stood before the kings of Israel out of great respect to them: but no king is said to stand before the high-priest, but only in this case, when he was to consult the holy oracle; that it might appear the honour was given not to the priest, but unto the Divine Majesty, whom he consulted by the priest.

Who shall ask counsel for him, after the judgment of urim.] Because the word thummim is here wanting, some understand these words, as if he had said, the high-priest shall ask counsel for him, by the illumination of the Spirit of God. So Conradus Pellicanus. But the word thummim, in all likelihood, is here to be understood, though not expressed, being always joined with urim (except in this and one other place, where urim only is named, after a short manner of speaking), in Exod. xxviii. Deut. xxxiii. Ezra ii. Nehem. vii. For they were inseparable from the breast-plate of judgment, as it is called Exod. xxviii. 30. (see there) with which the high-priest appeared before God when he consulted him in great affairs concerning the public safety, more especially in times of war; of which we have many instances in Judg. i. 1. xx. 18. 1 Sam. xiv. 18. xxviii. 6. David, indeed, is said to consult God by the ephod, but it must be observed that the breast-plate was annexed to it; which Abiathar brought along with him when he fled from Saul, who commanded the priests to be slain, 1 Sam. xxii. 2. 9. xxx. 8. 2 Sam. v. 19. And it is further to be noted, that, though David thus frequently consulted God this way, being engaged in wars, yet we never read that Solomon asked counsel by it, being a peaceable king.

Grotius also observes, that Joshua now, and the kings of Judah afterward, therefore stood before the priest, that they might be near to the urim and thummim, which he had upon his breast; without which he could not receive any answer, (De imperii Sum. Potest, &c. cap. 6.)

Before the Lord.] The high-priest never inquired by urim and thummim, but standing before the Lord; that is, before the ark, where the Schechinah was.

At his word shall they go out, and at his word shall they come in.] That is, saith Grotius, in the place forenamed, at the word of the Lord, by the judgment of urim, which goes just before. Others, at the word of the priest: which comes to the same. And this the Hebrew doctors understand concerning the people of Israel making war; which is wont to be meant in Scripture, by the words going out and coming in. And they distinguish between the war that was made by the Divine commandment (against the seven nations of Canaan, and against Amalek), and that which was voluntary against any of their neighbours, or others, as there should be reason. In the former case, they think there was no need to ask whether they should make war or not, because it was commanded; and Joshua and the kings afterward did it when they pleased. But in the other, they were not to make war without this Divine order. (See Selden, lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 12. n. 4.) But it is plain from Judg. i. 1. that they consulted the Lord also in the first sort of war (with the people of Canaan), how to manage it to the best advantage.

Both he and all the children of Israel with him, even all the congregation.] By the first word [he] the Jews understand Joshua, and all the succeeding princes of Israel, who were bound to advise with God by urim and thummim before they made war. And by the next words [all the children of Israel with him] they understand the priest that was particularly anointed to go with the people to war, (Deut. xx. 2.) And by the last words [the whole congregation] they understand the seventy elders, or the great Sanhedrin. So Maimonides, Abarbinel, and a great many others, expound these words (as Mr. Selden shews in the same place), from which they have framed this general maxim, that no private man might consult this oracle, but the king, and the head of the great Sanhedrin, and he that was appointed by all the people in their name. And that col ha edah [all the congregation] signifies frequently the great assembly of the elders and judges. (See also Bertram de Repub. Jud. p. 72.)

Here the Jews start a difficulty, as they account it, why we never read in the whole book of Joshua, that he consulted the Lord after this manner; but as soon as ever he was dead they did, (Judg. i. 1.) From whence Abarbinel concludes, that Joshua was bound to do this only at the first entrance upon his office, that all Israel might know he was Moses's successor, and that God was with him: but that afterward the spirit of prophecy rested upon him, and conducted him without this oracle. But if nothing was done that is not recorded in the Scripture, he might as well have said, that Joshua never consulted the oracle at all; for we do not read he did, though he be here so ordered. R. Levi ben Gersom, therefore, seems to me to speak more reasonably, when he says, that those words in the beginning of the book of Judges do not import that they did not consult God by urim in the life of Joshua, but only that after his death the children of Israel would not adventure to proceed in the war of Canaan without the same direction.

And there is something else which they might have observed from this verse, with great reason, which is, how much inferior Joshua was to Moses, though he succeeded him in the conduct of the people. For Moses never made use of the urim and thummim to consult God by the high-priest, but went directly and immediately to God himself: whereas Joshua was not admitted to such familiarity; nor had he such frequent revelations from God as Moses had. Yet sometimes God vouchsafed him the honour to speak to him, as we find in the beginning of Joshua, chap. iii. 7. iv. 1. 15, &c. And there was a most illustrious appearance of God to him before Jericho, (chap. v. 13, &c.)

Ver. 22. And Moses did as the Lord commanded him: and he took Joshua and set him before Eleazar, and before all the congregation.] According as he was ordered, ver. 18, 19. In this we see the great integrity, the sincere humility, and self-denial of Moses, that he readily submitted to have the government of Israel translated from his own family and tribe unto another, who was of the tribe of Ephraim, whereby his own children were reduced to a mean condition, being not so much as priests, but mere Levites. This demonstrates he acted not from himself, because he acted not for himself; but was contented to have the supreme authority placed where God pleased, both in church and state, and to leave his own family in an inconsiderable employment. This shews him to have had a principle which raised him above all other lawgivers, who always took care to advance their own families, and establish them in some share of that greatness which they themselves possessed. This likewise demonstrates, that the future rulers of this nation had no temptation to advance the credit of Moses beyond what it really was, since they were not descended from him, but were of other tribes.

Ver. 23. And he laid his hands upon him, and gave him a charge; as the Lord commanded by the hand of Moses.] He did all things which the Lord required to create him his successor, as the Jews speak: for thus (by laying on of hands) they in aftertimes made a man a member of the Sanhedrin, both of the great and of the small; which continued to the time of the destruction of the second temple; as Mr. Selden shews, (lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 7. n. 1.)

And this solemn designation of Joshua to the government by the Divine authority, was a clear indication that God continued to be their king, as he became in a special manner when he brought them out of Egypt, (as I observed upon Exod. iii. 10.) and he still reserved it to himself to appoint governors under him out of what tribe he pleased; as he did Joshua at this time out of the tribe of Ephraim; and not Caleb, who was of the tribe of Judah, and also a man as valiant as he was virtuous, (Josh. xiv. 11.) For there was no tribe that could lay claim unto this dignity without the gift of God. And this is one of the principal reasons, why the government of this people, before they had kings, was, as Josephus calls it, Θεοκρατία (that is, the empire of God), because he stirred them up judges to rule them when he pleased; which being of his immediate appointment, are so far acknowledged by him, that when they were weary of Samuel's government and desired a king, God declared, that it was not Samuel, but himself, whom they rejected. And another reason was (as our Mr. Thorndike observes), because God, by his oracle of urim and thummim, prescribed how they were to proceed in their public affairs, (Review of the Rites of the Church, p. 133.)

CHAP. XXVIII.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] Having numbered the people, and appointed his successor to bring them to their inheritance (which he had ordered to be divided among them, proportionable to the number of each tribe), nothing more was necessary than to persuade them to be truly religious, whereby they might be preserved in the enjoyment of it. Unto which Moses is commanded to direct them in this and in the following chapters; which may be thought to have been delivered also in the eighth month of the last year of their travels in the wilderness.

Ver. 2. Command the children of Israel, and say unto them.] These commands had been given before, but are here repeated, because this was a new generation, who either had not heard them when they were first delivered eight-and-thirty years ago; or, at least, had need to have their memories refreshed. Some things also are now more particularly explained concerning the sacrifices which were to be offered at certain times: and they are reduced into a certain order; some being daily, others weekly, others monthly, and some anniversary; all which were of such importance, that Moses, being shortly to leave them, thought good to repeat most of them once more in the book of Deuteronomy.

My offering, and my bread.] The word and is not in the Hebrew; but the words are, my offering, my bread: which Isaac Abarbinel thus excellently explains; Concerning offerings for sin, and trespass-offerings, and the rest, I shall not need to admonish you: but concerning my daily sacrifices, which properly of themselves are my own oblation, my daily bread, or my food, (which the Divine presence, dwelling among them, required, Exod. xxix. 42. 44. 45.) And so others by the word bread understand meat or food in general, as we translate it, ver. 24. though it may have a particular respect to the meat-offering, which was made of meal, and always accompanied the burnt-offerings, which seem here to be peculiarly meant; though some think these words relate to all the sacrifices, some part of which was God's portion.

For my sacrifices made by fire.] The whole burnt-offerings are most properly called ische (sacrifices made by fire), being all consumed upon the altar; where the heavenly fire burnt continually, ready for that purpose.

For a sweet savour unto me.] So the burnt-offering is called, Lev. i. 9. 13. 17. (See there.) I shall only add the paraphrase of the Jerusalem Targum, which is this, "My offering of bread which ye offer on the altar, doth not the fire devour it? And yet it is acceptable to me from you, as an odour in which I am well-pleased."

Shall ye observe to offer unto me.] Be very careful to see it duly performed: this being the food (saith Abarbinel), which, to speak after the manner of men, was offered by God's fire, upon his own altar, for his dinner and supper.

In due season.] For that reason this sacrifice was to be constantly offered, saith the same author, that the Divine fire which came down from heaven to consume the sacrifices might not be disappointed, and burn there in vain without any thing to do.

From this place the Jews endeavour to make out their custom of having stationary men, as they call them, to attend the daily sacrifice: taking moatho [in its season] as if it had been omatho [in its stations], but chiefly relying upon the first words of this verse, command the children of Israel, who could not all be present at the daily sacrifice, and therefore some particular persons were chosen to represent all the rest. For they thought it very indecent to have a sacrifice made for a man, and he not to stand by it; and therefore the first prophets ordained twenty-four courses of men, chosen out of the priests, Levites, and people, to stand in the temple, when the daily sacrifice was offered in the name of all Israel; and pray that God would accept it for them, as if they were all present. This account the Mischna gives of them in Taanath, and other places; where they say these men were held so necessary, that it was an usual speech among them, Without stations the world could not stand. For without sacrifices, that is, the worship of God, the world would be undone; and sacrifices could not be maintained without stations: (see Voysin de Jubilæo, cap. 25. and our learned Dr. Lightfoot in his Temple Service, chap. 7. sect. 3.)

Ver. 3. And thou shalt say unto them, This is the offering made by fire, which ye shall offer unto the Lord.] That offering which he peculiarly speaks of is the daily sacrifice; which was appointed long ago, before the tabernacle was set up, (Exod. xxix. 38, 39. see my notes there.) And add this, that God's promise to meet them there, (ver. 42, 43.) and afterward to dwell among them, (ver. 45.) seems to depend upon this constant service which he expected should be paid to him; which, if neglected, he withdrew himself from them.

Two lambs of the first year, day by day, continually.] This is expressly required in Exod. xxix. 38. Only here it is added, without spot, or perfect in its kind; which was required in all sacrifices, particularly in the first lamb which they offered, when they came out of Egypt, (Exod. xii. 5. see there.)

Ver. 4. The one lamb shalt thou offer in the morning, and the other lamb shalt thou offer at even.] The very words in Exod. xxix. 39.

Ver. 5. A tenth part of an ephah of flour for a meat-offering, mingled with the fourth part of a hin of beaten oil.] This is also there explained, Exod. xxix. 40.

Ver. 6. It is a continual burnt-offering.] To be continued throughout all your generations every day; as it is expressed Exod. xxix. 42. For it was in the nature of a daily prayer to God, that he would graciously continue his mercy unto Israel (as Abarbinel observes), and increase their corn, wine, and oil, which they acknowledged hereby they received from him.

Which was ordained in Mount Sinai.] There Moses received both this law, and all the rest (which are mentioned in the book of Exodus), concerning the service of God, and the place where it was to be performed, and his ministers, &c. And this sufficiently shews, that he speaks here to those who were so young at the first institution of these laws, that they gave the less heed to them, or had forgotten them. And there are those who think that for eight-and-thirty years they had disused them; which they gather from Deut. xii. 8. But I do not take it to be likely, that sacrifices were wholly omitted during that space; though perhaps not so regularly performed as when they came to Canaan. For to suppose that, is to suppose that the fire from heaven either went out, or burnt continually to no purpose; and that the Divine Majesty had no entertainment set upon his table; and consequently did not keep house, and dwell among them all that time: in short, that there was no worship of God at the tabernacle. All these arguments may convince any man, there were offered at least the daily sacrifice, morning and even, and those on the sabbath.

For a sweet savour, a sacrifice made by fire unto the Lord.] See Exod. xxix. 41.

Ver. 7. And the drink-offering thereof shall be the fourth part of a hin for the one lamb.] So it was ordained also in Mount Sinai, as appears from the same Exod. xxix. 40. And in this very book there is a general rule given to this new generation, that this should be the least quantity of wine which should be offered with a burnt-offering, or peace-offering. (See Numb. xv. 5.) Which was a thing so constantly practised, that the heathen never sacrificed, but they poured wine upon the flesh, as it flamed upon the altar. For though water was sometimes poured upon the sacrifices, yet Nonnus saith (lib. iv. Dionysiac.) it was when men knew not the use of wine; for after that was found out, they never sacrificed without it. (See Fort. Scacchus Myrothec. 2. cap. 42.)

In the holy place.] Upon the altar of burnt-offerings, which stood in the holy place, near to the door of the tabernacle, (Exod. xxix. 42.)

Shalt thou cause the strong wine to be poured out unto the Lord for a drink-offering.] The Hebrew word schecar commonly signifies any sort of strong drink, but here the noblest and most generous wine; for it was not lawful to use any other liquor in their sacrifices. The heathens had this reverence to their gods, that they always offered to them the most excellent wine they had; which appears by those words we meet withal so often in Homer (both in his Iliads and Odysses) of men's pouring out upon their sacrifices, —— αἴθοπα οἶνον, or black wine, of the deepest colour, red as blood; which was the richest of all other. And Herodian, speaking of the vast profuseness of Heliogabalus, who offered hecatombs of oxen every morning, with great multitudes of sheep, upon which he heaped all manner of spices, adds this also, (lib. v.) οἴνου τε τοῦ παλαιοτάτου καὶ καλλίστου πολλοὺς ἀμφορέας προχέων, &c. pouring out many flagons of the oldest and most excellent wine on the altars; so that rivers of wine and blood ran mixed together.

Ver. 8. And the other lamb shalt thou offer at even, &c.] All the foregoing verses relate to the morning sacrifice; and this only briefly prescribes, that the other lamb should be offered in the same manner at even, with the very same meat-offering and drink-offering. And as no sacrifice was to precede the morning burnt-offering, but it was to be offered first: so this at even was to conclude all the sacrifices of the day, and none to be offered after it.

A sacrifice made by fire, a sweet savour unto the Lord.] As acceptable to him as the morning sacrifice.

Ver. 9. And on the sabbath-day two lambs of the first year without spot.] He doth not mean, that, whereas every morning and evening they offered one lamb, on the sabbath-day they should offer two; but that there should be two lambs offered on the sabbath, over and above the daily offering, as appears from ver. 10. Whether one of them were to be offered in the morning, and the other added at the evening sacrifice, it is not said; but it is most probable the sacrifices on the sabbath were so ordered. For the Jews say, that, at the time of this additional sacrifice in the morning of the sabbath, they sang at the temple the song of Moses, (Deut. xxxii.) dividing it into six parts, and singing one part every sabbath; so that in six weeks they had finished it, and then began again. And at the evening sacrifice they sang that song of his Exod. xv. at which time the priests sounded the trumpets three times more than they did at the ordinary songs.

And two tenth-deals of flour for a meat-offering, mingled with oil, and the drink-offering thereof.] As the burnt-offerings were double on this day, so a double quantity of flour is ordered for the meat-offering that attended the burnt-offering (for only a tenth part of an ephah, ver. 5. was offered on other days), and consequently there was to be as much more oil and wine than daily. And here it may be fit to note, that, as soon as the drink-offering was poured out, then the song beforementioned began, with the trumpets and other instruments of music; but not till then: for the burnt-offering was not perfect, till the drink-offering, which was to accompany it, was offered; whereby it was completed. (See Dr. Lightfoot in his Temple Service, chap. 7. sect. 2.)

Ver. 10. This is the burnt-offering of every sabbath, besides the continual burnt-offering, and his drink-offering.] The daily sacrifice was not to be omitted on the sabbath, but this was to be added to it; and thence, by the Jews, called musaph. Of which sort there were seven more, which were to be added to the sacrifice of the day; viz. that in the new moon, (ver. 11.) at the Passover, (ver. 19.) and the feast of Pentecost, (ver. 26.) in the beginning of the year, (chap. xxix. 1.) on the day of expiation, (ver. 7.) on the feast of tabernacles there were peculiar sacrifices for seven days together, (Lev. xxiii. 35.) and on the last day of the feast another, (Numb. xxix. 35—37.) All these were called musaphim, or additional sacrifices to the daily sacrifice.

Ver. 11. And in the beginnings of your months ye shall offer a burnt-offering unto the Lord.] This solemn sacrifice seems to have been ordained by God, to prevent the idolatry which was usual among the gentiles; who worshipped the new moon with great rejoicings when it first appeared. Otherwise, the first day of every month was no festival; but only a day on which extraordinary sacrifices were offered with blowing of trumpets, as seems to be directed chap. x. 10. (see there:) which was usual at all solemn sacrifices (as I noted before), otherways the feast of blowing with trumpets was only on the new moon of the seventh month, and no other. And therefore it is observable, that there is no mention made of the first day of the month among the festivals appointed in Lev. xxiii. and consequently servile work was lawful on this day; and nothing more required but only the following sacrifices. The Jews at this day say, this solemnity was appointed rather for the women than the men (for which they give a fabulous reason), who are bound to abstain from all works; but the men only from the most laborious, such as ploughing the ground, &c. (See Buxtorf's Synag. Judaica, cap. 22.)

Two young bullocks and one ram, seven lambs of the first year without spot.] All these were burnt-offerings, which were offered besides the daily sacrifice, and besides the two lambs, if the first day of the month fell out to be a sabbath. In which case, and all others, where several solemnities met together on the same day, the daily sacrifice was offered first, and then the rest of the sacrifices peculiar for that day were to be performed, every one in its order. As for example, if the sabbath and new moon, and the feast of trumpets, fell out on the same day, they began with the daily morning sacrifice; after which followed the sacrifices proper to the sabbath; and after that the sacrifice appointed on the new moon; and then, those that belonged to the feast of trumpets: and all was concluded with the evening sacrifice, as Abarbinel observes in his preface to the book of Leviticus.

Ver. 12. And three tenth-deals of flour.] That is, three tenth parts of an ephah, (ver. 5.)

For a meat-offering, mingled with oil, for one bullock.] i. e. For each bullock there was to be this proportion of flour; which is exactly according to the general rule before given, (chap. xv. 9.)

And two tenth-deals of flour, mingled with oil, for one ram.] This is the proportion there prescribed for a ram, as the other for a bullock, (chap. xv. 6.)

Ver. 13. And a several tenth-deal of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat-offering, unto one lamb.] Unto each of the seven lambs beforementioned, (ver. 11.) a meat-offering was to be joined in less proportion than the other, according to the rule there given, (chap. xv. 4.)

For a burnt-offering of a sweet savour, &c.] See ver. 6.

Ver. 14. And their drink-offering shall be half a hin of wine unto a bullock.] See chap. xv. 10.

And the third part of a hin for a ram.] See there, ver. 7.

And a fourth part of a hin for a lamb.] See there, ver. 5. They that allegorize these things, think the new moon signifies the resurrection to a new life in the other world, where every one shall receive a reward according to his measure. Thus Procopius Gazæus; in whom they that think such expositions useful may find entertainment.

This is the burnt-offering of every month throughout the months of the year.] There are more sacrifices appointed on the new moons, than on the sabbath itself; because they returned seldomer. And the gentiles multiplying sacrifices on such occasions, if the Jews had not been thus employed in the worship of God, they might have been tempted to pay their services to idols.

Ver. 15. And one kid of the goats for a sin-offering.] This sacrifice of a goat for a sin-offering, saith the same Procopius, is coupled with the rest, being a shadow of the passion of Christ, for whose sake all our sacrifices are acceptable unto God the Father.

Unto the Lord.] It is well observed by Grotius, that these words unto the Lord were added, to put them in mind at this time of the right object of worship; when they were in danger to offer sacrifice to the moon, after the manner of the heathens. This is the more to be regarded, because a goat being appointed to be offered at two other solemnities, and to be offered for a sin-offering, (ver. 22. 30.) it is not said, unto the Lord (though certainly so intended), because there was no danger at those times to direct their sacrifices to a wrong object, as there was upon the new moons; when the heathen offered a goat unto the moon, it being a creature whose horns are like to those of a new moon. R. Bechai long ago observes this: "A goat (saith he) was offered to extirpate the religion of those who worshipped the moon; which makes the Scripture say expressly, unto the Lord." And Maimonides more largely in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 46. where, after he had taken notice of the difference between sin-offerings and burnt-offerings, the latter of which being wholly burnt, might be properly said to be unto the Lord, whereas sin-offerings were commonly eaten by the priests; he adds, that "this sin-offering is peculiarly said to be unto the Lord, lest any one should think this goat to be a sacrifice to the moon, after the manner of the Egyptians: which was not necessary to be said of the goats offered at other solemn times, because they were not in the beginning of the month, nor distinguished from other days by any natural sign, but only by the appointment of the law; which uses these words concerning this goat peculiarly, to pluck out of men's thoughts those inveterate and pernicious opinions of the gentiles; who had long sacrificed to the moon at this time, as they did to the sun at his rising, and when he entered into the several signs."

Besides the continual burnt-offering, and his drink-offering.] This is so often particularly mentioned, lest any should imagine it might be spared, when there were such liberal offerings of several kinds.

Ver. 16. And on the fourteenth day of the first month is the Passover of the Lord.] See Exod. xii. 6. 18. Lev. xxiii. 5. where it is called the Lord's Passover. (See Exod. xii. 27.)

Ver. 17. In the fifteenth day of this month is the feast.] The fourteenth day at even the feast of the Passover was kept, as appears from Exod. xii. 14. But on the fifteenth day began another feast, called the feast of unleavened bread. (See Lev. xxiii. 6.)

Seven days shall unleavened bread be eaten.] See Exod. xii. 15. xiii. 6, 7. Lev. xxiii. 6.

Ver. 18. On the first day shall be a holy convocation; ye shall do no manner of servile work therein.] See Exod. xii. 16. Lev. xxiii. 7.

Ver. 19. But ye shall offer a sacrifice made by fire, for a burnt-offering unto the Lord.] The solemnity was ordained before, and offerings also in general prescribed to be made seven days, (see Lev. xxiii. 8.) but the particular sacrifices not set down till now.

Two young bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs of the first year, they shall be unto you without spot.] The same sacrifices which were appointed to be offered upon every first day of the month, (ver. 11.)

Ver. 20. And their meat-offering shall be of flour, mingled with oil: three tenth-deals shall ye offer for a bullock, and two tenth-deals for a ram.] The very same which were appointed on the first day of every month, (ver. 12.)

Ver. 21. A several tenth-deal shalt thou offer for every lamb, throughout the seven lambs.] Just as it was in the forementioned sacrifice, (ver. 13.) And though the drink-offerings be not mentioned, they must be understood to be the same; because they always accompanied the meat-offerings of burnt-sacrifices, which were not complete without them.

Ver. 22. And one goat for a sin-offering, to make atonement for you.] As it was in the new moon, (ver. 15.) But meat and drink-offerings did not accompany offerings for sin, save only in the case of a leper; who was to bring three offerings, a sin-offering, a trespass-offering, and a burnt-offering for his cleansing, with three tenth parts of an ephah of flour, (Lev. xiv. 10, &c.)

Ver. 23. Ye shall offer these besides the burnt-offering of the morning, which is the continual offering.] There are two things that are here to be remarked; that these offerings (as I noted before) should not put by the continual burnt-sacrifice, but be added to it; and that all these were offered in the morning, after the daily morning sacrifice; and were not part of the evening sacrifice, which concluded all.

Ver. 24. After this manner ye shall offer daily, throughout the seven days.] Upon every one of the days of unleavened bread, (ver. 17.) which, though it was a great expense, yet was but a fitting acknowledgment of God's wonderful goodness to them, in bringing them out of the land of Egypt, with all their flocks and their herds; which was the foundation of all their happiness afterward, by making them a free people.

The meat of my sacrifice made by fire.] Here is the very same word with that ver. 2. where he calls this sacrifice his lechem, which we there translate his bread, but here very properly, his meat or food: which was set upon his table (the altar) every day, and by his fire from heaven consumed; which, according to the language of men, was called his eating of it: as the heathen gods also are said to eat the fat of their sacrifices, (Deut. xxxii. 38.)

Of a sweet savour unto the Lord.] Very acceptable to him; as hath been often observed.

It shall be offered besides the continual burnt-offering, and his drink-offering.] There is the greatest care taken (by the frequent repetition of this) that they should not think to save their daily sacrifice by these others; which were to be added to it, and not to supply the place of it. (See ver. 15.)

Ver. 25. And on the seventh day ye shall have a holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work therein.] This last day of the feast was equal to the first, (Lev. xxiii. 7, 8.) and is called a feast unto the Lord, Exod. xiii. 6.

Ver. 26. Also the day of the first-fruits.] Called the feast of harvest, the first-fruits of their labours, Exod. xxiii. 16. and the feast of weeks, when they brought the first-fruits of wheat-harvest, (Exod. xxxiv. 22. Deut. xvi. 10.) The Jews in their writings commonly call this feast by the name of atzereth, and so doth the Chaldee paraphrase upon this place; though Abarbinel observes, that this alone, of all the three great feasts, is never called so in the Holy Scripture. It is hard therefore to tell, why the Jews call it so in a singular manner; but our learned Dr. Lightfoot hath made several probable conjectures about it; one of which (and most pertinent to this place) is, because there was a restraint, as the word signifies, upon the people, from bringing their first-fruits till this feast. If any did, they received them not from them, but laid them by till this day came. (See Temple Service, chap. 14. sect. 4.)

When ye bring a new meat-offering unto the Lord.] Mentioned Lev. xxiii. 16. which were two loaves made of their first corn, ver. 17. where they are called the first-fruits unto the Lord.

After your weeks be out.] That is, the seven weeks which they were to number from the morrow after the sabbath, (Lev. xxiii. 15.) i. e. after the first day of unleavened bread: when they offered another sort of first-fruits (which must be carefully distinguished from those here mentioned), viz. of the barley-harvest, which began at the Passover; when they were to bring a sheaf of their first-fruits unto the priest, (Levit. xxiii. 10.) the presenting of which sheaf was an introduction to harvest, and procured them liberty to begin to put the sickle into the corn; which now, after seven weeks, they reaped, and carried in at this feast, when they brought these new first-fruits unto the Lord. All which is a description of that which in the New Testament is called the feast of Pentecost; being fifty days, as we read there in Leviticus, after the other great feast.

Ye shall have a holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work.] See Lev. xxiii. 21.

Ver. 27. But ye shall offer the burnt-offering for a sweet savour unto the Lord.] Over and above the burnt-offering which was prescribed to be offered with the two loaves beforementioned, (Lev. xxiii. 18.) unto which this was an additional sacrifice, plainly distinct from it.

Two young bullocks, one ram, seven lambs of the first year.] The very same that were ordered to be offered upon every new moon, and every day of the feast of unleavened bread, ver. 11. 19, &c. whereas that in Leviticus is one young bullock, two rams, and seven lambs.

Ver. 28. And their meat-offering of flour mingled with oil, three tenth-deals unto one bullock, &c.] The very same that is prescribed to accompany the burnt-offering on the new moon, and in the feast of unleavened bread, (ver. 12. 20.)

Ver. 29. And a several tenth-deal unto one lamb, throughout the seven lambs.] So it is ordained before in the former cases, (ver. 13. 21.)

Ver. 30. And one kid of the goats to make an atonement for you.] Besides the kid prescribed for the same purpose, when the two loaves were offered, (Lev. xxiii. 19.) which was accompanied with two lambs for a sacrifice of peace-offerings. So that there were a great many sacrifices offered at this famous festival; though it did not last so long as that of the Passover.

Ver. 31. Ye shall offer them besides the continual burnt-offering.] He still takes care that this daily sacrifice should not be omitted, by reason of such a number of other sacrifices, which were to attend upon it, but not to put it by, (ver. 10. 15. 23.)

They shall be unto you without blemish.] This might have been sufficiently understood, from what was said of the daily offering, (ver. 3.) and of all the other prescribed in this chapter, (ver. 11. 19.) But, lest any profane person might think there was no need to be so scrupulous about these sacrifices, because it is only said, two young bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs of the first year, (ver. 27.) these words are also here added, to take away all doubt; they shall be unto you without blemish, i. e. as perfect as all the rest are ordered to be.

It is observable, that there is not so much as one peace-offering ordered in all this chapter, which was a sort of sacrifice that was most for the benefit of those that brought it to the altar; but all burnt-offerings (except a few sin-offerings), which were wholly for the honour of God, and acknowledgment of his sovereign dominion over them, and of the duty they owed him. And as the sin-offerings were shadows of that great sacrifice of God's own Son, which was one day to be offered for the sins of men, out of his infinite love to them; so the whole burnt-offerings (which were always of the most perfect creatures, the finest flour, the choicest fruits of the earth, and the best liquor) were shadows of that excellent degree of piety, which the Son of God intended to bring into the world; which would move men, out of love to God, to give themselves wholly up to him, and devote all they had, even their own lives, to his service.

CHAP. XXIX.

Ver. 1. AND in the seventh month.] Which was anciently the first month of the year; but now the seventh, reckoning from that wherein the Passover was kept; which for a special reason was made the first: (see Exod. x. 2.)

On the first day of the month ye shall have a holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work.] So it was ordained before, in Lev. xxiii. 24, 25.

It is a day of blowing of trumpets unto you.] In that place of Leviticus it is called a memorial of blowing of trumpets from morning until evening; which the Jews fancy was to awaken them to repentance, upon the great day of expiation, which followed on the tenth day of this month. But it was manifestly intended quite contrary, to excite them unto joy and gladness: for zichron teruah is a memorial of jubilation, triumph, and shouting for joy; the word teruah being never used in Scripture, but for a sound, or shout of gladness; as the Chaldee word jabbaba, which is here used by the paraphrast, always signifies. And this agrees with their notion, who think it was a special remembrance of the creation of the world, at which the angels rejoiced. Or, it might be ordained to stir up the people to a grateful remembrance of all God's benefits the year past. Whatsoever was the cause, certain it is, this seventh month was very famous on this account, that more solemn days were to be kept in it than in all the year besides; and upon that account, the people might be awakened, by this blowing of trumpets, to observe them aright.

Ver. 2. And shall offer a burnt-offering for a sweet savour unto the Lord.] Over and above all other sacrifices, which were heretofore ordered upon this day, as appears from ver. 6.

One bullock, one ram, and seven lambs of the first year, without blemish.] This is less than was appointed upon the foregoing festivals, (chap. xxviii. 19. 27.) because those very sacrifices were also to be offered upon this day, on another account; as I shall observe on ver. 6.

Ver. 3. And their meat-offering shall be of flour mingled with oil, three tenth-deals for a bullock, and two for a ram.] This is the proportion appointed, by a general rule, for all sacrifices of this kind. (See the fifteenth chapter of this book, ver. 6. 9.)

Ver. 4. And one tenth-deal for one lamb, &c.] So it is there appointed, (ver. 4.)

Ver. 5. And one kid of the goats for a sin-offering, to make an atonement for you.] As is appointed in the foregoing festivals, (chap. xxviii. 15. 22. 30.)

Ver. 6. Besides the burnt-offering of the morning, with his meat-offering.] It was appointed before, that in the beginning of every month there should be a burnt-offering offered of two bullocks, &c. (chap. xxviii. 11, 12.) which was not to be omitted in the beginning of this month; but these other sacrifices added to the offerings of every new moon: which made this a greater new moon than any other; being the first moon of the old civil year.

And the daily burnt-offering, and his meat-offering, and their drink-offerings.] With which the solemnity of the day began; and then followed the proper sacrifices belonging to it.

According to their manner.] Or, in the order which God appointed: which I observed before (on chap. xxviii. 11.) was this; that, first, the daily burnt-sacrifice was offered; then the sacrifices appointed for the first day of every month; and then those appointed for this first day of the seventh month.

For a sweet savour, a sacrifice made by fire unto the Lord.] Which was acceptable to the Divine Majesty, when performed according to his directions.

Ver. 7. And ye shall have on the tenth day of this month a holy convocation.] This solemn assembly is ordered twice before in the book of Leviticus, (chap. xvi. 29. xxiii. 27.) and here repeated, perhaps, for the sake of Eleazar and Joshua, who were newly advanced to their several offices, that they might take special notice of it, and see it observed.

And ye shall afflict your souls.] That was the special intention of it (as we read in both the forenamed places), that they might receive the benefit of the atonement on this day made.

Ye shall not do any work therein.] It was to be observed as strictly as a sabbath, (Levit. xvi. 31. xxiii. 32.) wherein they were to abstain not merely from servile work, but from all manner of work whatsoever, (Levit. xvi. 29. xxiii. 28. 30.)

Ver. 8. And ye shall offer a burnt-offering unto the Lord for a sweet savour.] Endeavour to procure acceptance of the rest of the sacrifices of the day, with this whole burnt-offering, besides the daily sacrifice; as it follows, (ver. 11.)

One bullock, one ram, and seven lambs of the first year, &c.] The same that were appointed on the foregoing solemnity, ver. 2. (except the monthly offering, ver. 6.) to which was added another ram for a burnt-offering, (Levit. xvi. 5.) as a devout acknowledgment that they owned him alone for their sovereign Lord.

Ver. 9, 10. And their meat-offering shall be of fine flour, &c.] The meat-offering attending these burnt-offerings was to be in the same proportion as before ordered, (ver. 3, 4.)

Ver. 11. One kid of the goats for a sin-offering.] As was appointed in the foregoing solemnity, (ver. 5.)

Besides the sin-offering of atonement.] Mentioned Levit. xvi. 9, &c. whose blood was carried by the high-priest into the most holy place; which was done in no other sacrifice but that, and the bullock which was offered as a sin-offering for the family of Aaron on the same day, (Levit. xvi. 14.)

And the continual burnt-offering, and the meat-offering of it, and their drink-offerings.] These were no more to be omitted on the great day of atonement, than on any other day; but the service of the day was to begin with the continual burnt-offering; and then followed the burnt-offerings, with the meat and drink-offerings belonging to them, and the sin-offering here prescribed; and then the sacrifice of atonement, and all that is ordered in the sixteenth chapter of Leviticus, for the expiation of the sins of all the people of Israel: which sacrifice the present Jews now wanting, and yet being sensible of the necessity of some satisfaction, but not believing in our blessed Saviour, who hath fully made it for all mankind; they are in a lamentable plunge, and are put to most wretched shifts to devise something to supply the place of the sacrifice of atonement, which was wont to be made for them. One is their own death; it being the continual prayer of every one of them, upon their death-bed, "Let my death be the expiation for my sins." Another is (which is so absurd, that Leo Modina saith they do not use it now in Italy, nor in the eastern countries), the killing of a white cock (if one can be got) by the men, and a white hen by the women, on the eve of this day, saying, "Let this cock be an exchange for me; let it come in my stead; let it be my expiation; let it die, but I and Israel live happily;" as Buxtorf shews in his Synagog. Judaica, cap. 25. Which I should not here mention, were it not to shew, that they have the very same notion still of a sacrifice for sin (even now that they can only make an imitation of it), which we have of the sacrifice of Christ, who was put in our place, and offered himself to God in our stead; and that it ought to be pure and innocent, which is offered instead of a sinner.

Ver. 12. And on the fifteenth day of the seventh month ye shall have a holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work.] See Levit. xxiii. 35.

And ye shall keep a feast unto the Lord seven days.] viz. The feast of tabernacles, (Levit. xxiii. 34.) which was after the harvest and vintage, (Deut. xvi. 13.) and kept seven days with great joy and gladness of heart; but they were not bound to abstain from servile work all this time, but only on the first day and on the seventh.

Ver. 13. And ye shall offer a burnt-offering, a sacrifice made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord.] The same kind of sacrifice which was prescribed on the other festivals, to be offered up wholly in honour of God: but here is a far larger proportion than in any other solemnity.

Thirteen young bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs of the first year, &c.] On the other festivals two bullocks sufficed, (chap. xxviii. 11. 19. 27.) and on the festival in the beginning of this month only one was appointed; but here are thirteen; and so they continued to be offered seven days successively, with the decrease only of one bullock every day, till on the seventh day only seven bullocks were offered, which in all made seventy bullocks. The rams also and the lambs were in a double proportion to what was usual throughout the whole festival; which was a vast charge, but more easy at this time of the year than any other, because now their barns were full, and their wine-presses overflowed; and their hearts might well be supposed to be more enlarged than at other times, in thankfulness to God for his great benefits. Yet this very gross, troublesome, and expensive way of serving God, made the best men among them groan, and long for the coming of Christ; in whose days, their own doctors say, no sacrifices shall remain, but those of thanksgiving, and praise, and prayer. With which they have been forced to be content for above sixteen hundred years; and, instead of these additional sacrifices unto the daily, have added peculiar prayers (which they also call musaphim) unto the common prayers they used every day: (See Buxtorf concerning the feast of the new moon, in his Synagog. Jud. cap. 22.)

Ver. 14, 15. Their meat-offering shall be of fine flour, &c.] The same proportions which are ordered, by a general rule, to every sacrifice of a bullock, and of a ram, (chap. xv.)

Ver. 16. And one kid of the goats for a sin-offering, besides the continual burnt-offering, &c.] There is no augmentation of the sin-offering; but it is the same with that on other festivals, (ver. 5.) And all these sacrifices, it appears by this, were to be added to the daily sacrifice.

Ver. 17. And on the second day ye shall offer twelve young bullocks, &c.] Here one bullock less, than on the day before, is ordered to be offered; and so on every succeeding day there is still a decrease of one bullock; which is all the difference between the offerings on the seven days of this feast, upon every one of which there was the same number of rams and lambs, without any diminution. Which Moses thought fit to set down distinctly from this verse to the thirty-fifth, that there might be no mistake. But little need be noted upon them.

Ver. 18. According to their number, after the manner.] Prescribed ver. 14, 15.

Ver. 35. On the eighth day ye shall have a solemn assembly.] There is a peculiar word here used to denote this to be a great day, as I noted upon Lev. xxiii. 36. (See there.)

Ye shall do no servile work therein.] It was to be observed as the first day of the feast of tabernacles, both of them being called a sabbath, Lev. xxiii. 39.

Ver. 36. But ye shall offer a burnt-offering, a sacrifice made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord.] Here is a peculiar sacrifice appointed upon this day, in the same terms as upon the first day of the feast of tabernacles, (ver. 13.)

One bullock, one ram, seven lambs of the first year, &c.] But though this was an extraordinary day, and a distinct festival, (as I shewed upon Lev. xxiii. 39.) yet here are fewer sacrifices prescribed on this day, than upon any of the foregoing seven. For on every one of them two rams were offered and fourteen lambs; and here but half so many: and seven bullocks were the fewest that were offered upon any of those days (and on the first day thirteen), but here only one. By which God consulted, perhaps, the weakness of mankind, who naturally grew weary both of the charge and of the labour of such services, when they were long-continued: and therefore he made them every day less toilsome and expensive; and put them in mind, likewise, that the multitude of sacrifices did not procure their acceptance with God; and in length of time they would come to nothing, and be utterly abolished, to establish something better in their room.

Ver. 37. Their meat-offering, and their drink-offerings, for the bullock, for the ram, and for the lambs, shall be according to their number, after the manner.] In such proportions as God had before ordained in the fifteenth chapter of this book, in the beginning of it; as I have often observed.

Ver. 38. And one goat for a sin-offering, besides the continual burnt-offering, &c.] This is never omitted upon any festival, (chap. xxviii. 15. 22. 30. xxix. 5. 11. 16. 19, &c.) to put them in mind, that, after all their services, they stood in need of forgiveness.

Ver. 39. These things shall ye do (or offer) unto the Lord in your set feasts.] All these feasts were fixed and stated at certain times; on which God was to be worshipped after the manner here prescribed in these two chapters. For all these offerings (except one sin-offering upon each set day) were wholly burnt-offerings (as I have already observed), which may properly be said to be done, that is, offered unto the Lord; neither people nor priests having any share in them.

Besides your vows, and your free-will-offerings, for your burnt-offerings.] Besides these, every man might offer other burnt-offerings; either in performance of a vow, or freely, out of his affection to God. (See chap. xv. 3.)

For your meat-offerings, and for your drink-offerings.] There are five several sorts of meat-offerings; which were left to every man's free-will, to bring as he pleased. See the second chapter of Leviticus, where they are described.

And for your peace-offerings.] These are described in the third chapter of that book: a great number of which, it is likely, men offered voluntarily upon all the forementioned festivals; for otherwise they would have had no means to feast with God at his house, nor to entertain their friends and neighbours, as the custom was at such times of public rejoicing; which they did upon that part of the peace-offerings which was given them, after the fat was offered to God, and the wave-breast and heave-shoulder given to the priest, (Lev. vii. 15, &c. 34.)

Ver. 40. And Moses told the children of Israel, according to all that the Lord commanded Moses.] He acquainted all the people (by the heads of their tribes, perhaps, of whom we read in the beginning of the next chapter) with all these commands of God, which concerned his worship and service.

CHAP. XXX.

Ver. 1. AND Moses spake unto the heads of the tribes.] There were wont to be extraordinary assemblies of these, or other great men, upon special occasions, as Mr. Selden observes, (lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 14. n. 4.) who are sometimes called, as they are here, the heads of all the tribes, and the elders, (Deut. v. 23.) and, in other places, the heads of the people, (Deut. xxx. 5.) the whole congregation of the children of Israel, (Josh. xviii. 1. xxii. 12.) the chief of all the people, (Judg. xx. 2.) all Israel, (1 Sam. vii. 5.) all the princes of Israel, the princes of the tribes, (1 Chron. xxviii. 1.) all the elders of Israel, and heads of the tribes, and chief of the fathers, (2 Chron. v. 2.) the counsel of the princes and elders, (Ezra x. 8.) And it is commonly said by the Hebrew doctors, concerning such assemblies, that wheresoever the children of Israel were met together, or the greater part of them, there the Schechinah (that is, the Divine Majesty, or the Holy Ghost, as they sometimes speak) was wont to rest.

Concerning the children of Israel, saying.] Acquainted them with a matter which concerned all the people; willing them to communicate it to them.

This is the thing which the Lord hath commanded.] It is very probable there had been some case propounded to him about vows; concerning which he here gives such rules, as might direct them in time to come.

Ver. 2. If a man.] It is reasonable to think, that this includes the other sex also; provided they be in their own power, and not subject to another, and be in their right mind.

Vow a vow unto the Lord.] Promise solemnly unto God something that is for his honour and service; for that seems to be meant by unto the Lord: as, that he will offer some sacrifice at the feast abovementioned, more than is prescribed; or afflict his soul on some other day, besides the day of atonement. (See ver. 13.)

Or swear an oath to bind his soul with a bond.] Whether it be a simple vow, or bound also with a solemn oath; which made a double obligation, by calling God to witness the sincerity of his intentions.

He shall not break his word.] In the Hebrew it is, he shall not profane his word; for it being solemnly passed to God, it made him vile and contemptible if he did not keep it. The Jewish doctors very prudently advise their scholars not to accustom themselves to make vows, but to content themselves with doing what the law commands, and abstaining from what it forbids; but if they did make them, to look upon it as a high affront to God not to perform them.

He shall do according to all that proceedeth out of his mouth.] If the thing be lawful, and possible. And if he appointed no time for the doing of it, he was to think himself obliged to do it presently, without delay, (Deut. xxii. 21.)

Ver. 3. If a woman also vow a vow unto the Lord.] As most interpreters think the word man, in the foregoing verse, comprehends women, who were in as perfect liberty as the men he speaks of; so the word woman here comprehends all men, who are in the same circumstances with those women, whom he here directs in their vows: whom he considers in a threefold state; before they are married, and after marriage, and in their widowhood.

And bind herself by a bond.] By an oath, wherewith she confirms her vow; as it seems to be interpreted ver. 10. 13.

Being in her father's house, in her youth.] That is, being a part of his family, and still under his government, and not married. For the father's power lasts no longer, as Grotius observes, (lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 5. n. 7.) In which condition likewise are all sons, who remain in their father's family, undisposed of in marriage: and all servants, who are manifestly in subjection to their masters; and therefore could no more resolve to do what they pleased, than the women here mentioned.

Ver. 4. And her father heareth her vow, and her bond wherewith she hath bound herself.] The first of these may relate to her simple vow; and the next to an oath wherewith she binds it, to make it firmer; which her father is supposed to hear, either when she spake the words, or when she acquainted him with her vow, as in duty she was bound to do.

And her father shall hold his peace at her.] If he did not declare that he disallowed what she had promised, it was supposed he consented to it: unless he said he would take time to consider, and neither allow nor disallow for the present; in which case, in all reason, she was to wait for his resolution.

Then all her vows shall stand, &c.] It was not in his power afterward to disannul any of them, if he did not contradict them when he was told of them, or after the time he had taken for deliberation.

Ver. 5. But if her father disallow her in the day that he heareth.] As soon as he comes acquainted with it.

Not any of her vows, or her bonds, wherewith she hath bound her soul, shall stand.] Though she had bound her vows with an oath, they were not to be performed, when her father had declared his will to the contrary.

And the Lord shall forgive her.] The not performing her vow shall not be imputed to her as a sin.

Because her father disallowed her.] Whose consent was supposed to be necessary, before the vow could be binding; she being, while a part of his family, under his power, and not her own. Some have fancied, that when her father was dead the vow revived, because then she was at her own disposal: but it is plain, her father wholly disannulled the vow, when he did not approve it; so that it could not recover a force it never had, being made without his consent. The same is to be said of a guardian, who was supposed to be in the place of a father, when he died and left his children to his care. And this power was fit to be reserved to parents (as a late learned man, Puffendorf, observes), not only lest women, in their imprudent years, should undo themselves, by vowing more than their fortunes could bear; but also, lest the paternal estate should be burdened by such vows, or the necessary affairs of the family hindered. So that this power did not flow from positive laws, but from natural reason; nobody that is subject to another having any right to dispose of those things which are under that power to which they are subject.

Ver. 6. And if she had at all a husband when she vowed.] Was a married woman, or espoused to a husband, though still in her father's house (as it appears from ver. 10. this must be interpreted), when she made this vow, then it was to be considered, not what her father, but her husband (under whose power she now was) should determine about it.

Or uttered aught out of her lips, wherewith she bound her soul.] Said any thing, which she confirmed by an oath.

Ver. 7. And her husband heard it.] Either was present when she spake it; or she told it him afterward.

And he held his peace, in the day that he heard it.] Said nothing to signify his disallowance of it: (see ver. 4.)

Then her vows shall stand, &c.] As before, (ver. 4.)

Ver. 8. But if her husband disallow her, &c.] See ver. 5. where there is the same case of a daughter under the power of her father, as here of a wife under the power of her husband.

Ver. 9. But every vow of a widow, or of her that is divorced, wherewith she hath bound her soul, shall stand against her.] The reason of this is so plain, that one would think it needed not to have been mentioned, because such women were wholly in their own power, being free from their husbands. Therefore it is very probable he speaks here of a widow, or divorced woman, returned to her father's house, (as the manner frequently was, Lev. xxii. 13.) who might be supposed to recover his ancient power over her, to disannul her vows, as he might before she was married: which is here absolutely condemned; for though she lived with him, she was her own woman (as we now speak), and might dispose of herself and her goods as she pleased, without his consent.

Ver. 10. And if she vowed in her husband's house, or bound her soul by a bond with an oath.] i. e. Engaged herself in a vow, and perhaps confirmed it with an oath, while she and her husband lived together, or before she was divorced from him.

Ver. 11. And her husband heard it, and held his peace, and disallowed it not: then all her vows shall stand, &c.] She was bound, in this case, to make them good after he was dead, or she was divorced from him.

Ver. 12. But if her husband hath utterly made them void on the day he heard them, &c.] Then, when she was in her own power, by his death, or by a divorce, she was not bound to make them good; because, when she made them, her husband, under whose power she then was, had utterly made them void.

Ver. 13. Every vow, and every binding oath, to afflict the soul.] This shews what the matter of these vows frequently was; to abstain from such or such meats, though in themselves lawful; or to fast, and eat nothing at all on other days, as well as on the great day of expiation; which was the only fast ordained by the law of Moses.

Her husband may establish it, or her husband may make it void.] There is an excellent discourse of Maimonides', in his More Nevochim, (par. iii. cap. 48.) to shew that this is most reasonable; where he observes, that, as the law prohibited some meats, so pious people sometimes vowed to forbear such as were not prohibited; that by this means they might learn contentment with a little, or continence, and give a check to an immoderate appetite. From whence the saying among the doctors, that Vows are the hedge of separation; i. e. a great guard to a holy life. But since, through the vehemence of their affections and passions, many women are prone to act unadvisedly, if vows were wholly in their power, great inconveniences, dissensions, and confusions, might arise in families, whilst this sort of meat is lawful to the husband, but not to the wife; this permitted to the daughter, but prohibited to the mother. For which reason (saith he) this authority was given to the governors of families; in all things to order them, as they saw would be for their profit, or detriment.

Ver. 14. But if her husband.] Or, for if her husband.

Altogether held his peace at her, from day to day.] When he knew what she had vowed; as it follows in the end of the verse.

He establisheth all her vows, &c.] His silence was to be interpreted a consent to allow what she vowed. There was no need to add the contrary; which is here to be understood: that if he said he did not allow them, then they should not bind her.

Ver. 15. But if he shall any ways make them void, after he hath heard them.] Hinder her from performing her vow, after he had given his consent, by saying nothing against it, when he heard her make the vow.

Then he shall bear her iniquity.] God will punish him, not her, for not performing the vow. Paulus Fagius thinks the meaning is, that if the first day he heard of her vow he did not disannul it, but attempted to do it the next day, or the third day after, he should bear the blame, if the vow was not made good.

Ver. 16. These are the statutes which the Lord commanded Moses between a man and his wife, between the father and his daughter, being yet in her youth, in her father's house.] It is likely some differences arose in some families about these matters; and therefore these laws were made for the settling the power of husbands over their wives, and parents over their children, while they were young, and continued a part of their family.

CHAP. XXXI.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] Not long before his death, as appears from the next verse.

Ver. 2. Avenge the children of Israel of the Midianites.] This had been commanded before, but no time set for it; which now is determined. The Moabites are not mentioned; because the Midianites seem to have been the first or chief contrivers of that mischief which befel the Israelites, by the enticements of their women: (see chap. xxv. 17, 18.)

Afterward shalt thou be gathered unto thy people.] When he had given a few other directions, concerning their possessing the countries already conquered, and the land of Canaan, (chap. xxxii. xxxiv. xxxv.) and providing for the Levites there, (chap. xxxvi.) God had warned him to prepare for his death before this, (chap. xxvii. 12.) but he first let him have the satisfaction of seeing the Midianites punished; and gave him some time to settle the public affairs, and to make also a long exhortation to the Israelites, to observe all that he had commanded them.

Ver. 3. And Moses spake unto the people, saying.] He speedily put this command in execution; which might possibly be in the ninth month of the fortieth year.

Arm some of yourselves unto the war.] He doth not at first determine the number; but as many as pleased might offer themselves voluntarily, to be ready to obey him.

And let them go against the Midianites, and avenge the Lord of Midian.] The Lord bade him avenge the children of Israel, (ver. 2.) but Moses bids them avenge the Lord: for they had the same interest, and were both injured at the same time, and by the same means. And as God was so gracious as to resent the evil done to Israel, so Moses, in duty and gratitude to God, thought himself bound rather to consider the dishonour that was done to him, whose war this was; not only because undertaken by his command, but in his quarrel (with those who had drawn the Israelites to idolatry), and for the sake of his people.

Ver. 4. Of every tribe a thousand, throughout all the tribes of Israel, shall ye send to the war.] When a great many, perhaps all the people, appeared ready to go to war, he ordered, that only a select number should be sent, of a thousand out of each of the twelve tribes.

Ver. 5. So there were delivered, out of the thousands of Israel, a thousand of every tribe.] Their officers picked out this number from among the rest; or they were chosen by lot for this service; or they stepped out and offered themselves volunteers (as we speak), which the twenty-seventh verse may seem to countenance, where they are called, those that took the war upon them.

Twelve thousand armed for war.] This was but a small number, compared with the whole nation of the Midianites, (who had five kings, ver. 8.) But God would have them rely more upon him, than upon the multitude of a host; and let them see, by their success against this people, that they needed not fear the conquest of Canaan.

Ver. 6. And Moses sent them to the war, a thousand of every tribe.] He gave them their commission to fight the Midianites.

Them and Phineas the son of Eleazar the priest.] Who was not their commander-in-chief (or their general, as we now speak), for it did not belong to the priestly office to conduct armies: and it is said expressly in the words following, he went with the holy instruments, &c. to be ready to perform all such sacred offices, as should be required by the general, who, it is most likely, was Joshua. It is true, indeed, that Phineas was a man of great courage, and had lately performed a singular piece of service, which had won him great reputation. This hath made some think, he was the fitter to go and to avenge the Lord of Midian, as he had begun to do, (chap. xxv. 8.) In aftertimes also, in the days of the Maccabees, who were of the family of the priests, the armies of Israel were led by them against their enemies. But then it must be considered, that they were also the supreme governors of the people, and there were no other.

With the holy instruments.] By which Jonathan understands the urim and thummim; which some think Phineas carried along with him, wherewith to consult the Divine Majesty, in case of any difficulty that might arise about the management of the war. And to make out this, they suppose Eleazar to be old and crazy, or labouring under some infirmity; which was the reason that Phineas his son was substituted in his room to perform this office. (See our very learned Dr. Spencer, Dissert. de Urim et Thummim, cap. 6. sect. 2.) But this may be justly doubted, whether Phineas, being only the son of the high-priest, and not yet capable of that office, could be substituted to perform this great charge, which belonged to the high-priest alone. Nor do we find any warrant for consulting the Lord by urim and thummim, but only before the most holy place, (see chap. xxvii. 21.) And therefore it seems to me far more likely, that he means the ark, which was wont to be carried, in following times, into the field, when they went to fight with their enemies, (1 Sam. iv. 4, 5. xiv. 18. 2 Sam. xi. 1.) Yea, Joshua himself, not long after this time, ordered the ark to be carried, with priests blowing the trumpets before it, when he surrounded Jericho, (Josh. vi. 4. 6, 7, &c.) And therefore the holy instruments being here joined with the trumpets to blow in his hand, it makes it the more probable, that the ark may be here meant; there being also something in this very book to countenance this opinion: (see chap. xiv. 44. but especially chap. xxxii. 20. 22.)

But it must be confessed, that it is never thus expressed in any other place of Holy Scripture, but always called the ark of God, or of the covenant, or the testimony, or the like. And therefore, perhaps, they give the truest sense of these words, who take the following words to be an explication of them; that is, the trumpets were the holy instruments, which he carried in his hand.

And the trumpets to blow in his hand.] Which he delivered to the priests who followed him, to sound an alarm, when they went to fight, according to the direction, chap. x. 8, 9. and as the practice was in future ages, (2 Chron. xiii. 12.)

Ver. 7. And they warred against the Midianites.] It is not certain whether the Midianites came out of their country to give them battle; or they first broke into their country, and then fought their army.

As the Lord commanded Moses.] One would think this meant no more, but that they obeyed the commandment of God beforementioned, (ver. 2.) But the Jews think he hath respect to another particular commandment, which they say was given by Moses, when they went out to this war: that they should not, when they besieged any city, begirt it quite round, but only on three sides; leaving one naked, that the besieged might flee away, if they pleased; by which means effusion of human blood was prevented. So Guil. Schickard observes out of Siphri in his Mischpat Hammeleeh, cap. 5. Theor. 18. and Mr. Selden since him, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 15. where he shews they understand this of all wars but those against the seven nations in Canaan and Amalek; towards whom this kindness was not shewn, as appears by the siege of Jericho. But the laws about managing wars, which are mentioned in the book of Deuteronomy, do not seem to have been yet given; though the Jews fancy this law was now given about Midian, and observed ever after.

And slew all the males.] Who were in this fight, and did not save themselves by flight.

Ver. 8. And they slew the kings of Midian.] Little kings, called princes, Josh. xiii. 21. where they are said to be dukes of Sihon, i. e. great men tributary to Sihon, while he continued king of the Amorites. But after the Israelites had conquered him, they took, perhaps, the title of kings.

Besides the rest of them that were slain.] They made not only a great slaughter of the people, but killed their chief commanders, who led them on.

Namely, Evi, and Rekem, and Zur, &c.] They are particularly named, that all their neighbours might be satisfied of the truth of this history. And he that is called Zur, is thought to have been the father of Cozbi, whom Phineas slew.

Balaam also, the son of Beor, they slew with the sword.] He had seen such good success of his wicked counsel, (which he gave either as he went home, or returning again to them: see chap. xxiv. ult.) that, presuming the Israelites were forsaken of their God, he adventured to go along with the Midianites unto this battle; hoping he might curse the Israelites, now that iniquity (i. e. idolatry) was found among them; which he could not do while they were free from it. Thus he perished by his own wicked devices; and was so far from having his wish, that he might "die the death of the righteous" (that is, live long), that (as the Jews say) he was slain in the thirty-fourth year of his age. The doctors in the Gemara of the Sanhedrin, (cap. 11. sect. 11.) ask, "What did he here?" To which R. Johanan makes answer, "He went to receive his reward for the death of the twenty-four thousand Israelites, which he had procured," (chap. xxv. 9.) And thus, saith another, "it happened unto him, according to the proverb, The camel went to desire horns, and they cut off his ears."

Ver. 9. And the children of Israel took all the women of Midian captive, and their little ones.] After they were masters of the field (as we speak) by the overthrow of their armies, they fell upon their cities; and, according to the ancient custom in the most bloody wars, they killed only the men, but no women nor children, (Gen. xxxiv. 25. 1 Kings xi. 16.) And so the law of God afterward required they should do, when they took any city that did not belong to the Canaanites, (Deut. xx. 13, 14.) who were utterly to be destroyed, ver. 16, 17. where he saith, "Thou shalt save nothing alive that breatheth."

And they took the spoil of all their cattle, and all their flocks, and all their goods.] As belonging to them, by the right of conquest, in a just war.

Ver. 10. And they burnt all their cities wherein they dwelt, and their goodly castles, with fire.] Made the country desolate, that they who fled might have no encouragement to return again; nor be able, without great hazard, to settle themselves there, where they had not a fortress left to defend them. This was but a necessary care; notwithstanding which they had peopled the country again so well, in the space of about two hundred years, that they were able to oppress the Israelites; as we read Judges iv. 1.

Ver. 11. And they took all the spoil, and all the prey, both of men and of beasts.] They had possessed themselves of them before, (ver. 9.) but now they carried them away.

Ver. 12. And they brought the captives, and the prey, and the spoil.] Here are three different words to express their booty, which they brought to the camp of Israel: the first of which signifies the women and children that were taken; the second, the cattle and the flocks (though sometimes it includes in it men and women); and the third, their money and goods.

Unto Moses, and Eleazar the priest, and unto the congregation of the children of Israel.] Unto the seventy elders, and princes of the tribes, who were assembled with them, (see chap. xxix. 1.) as it seems to be expounded in the next verse.

Unto the camp at the plains of Moab, &c.] From whence they marched against Midian; and had been encamped there a great while, (chap. xxii. 1. xxvi. 3. 63.)

Ver. 13. And Moses, and Eleazar the priest, and all the princes of the congregation, went forth to meet them without the camp.] Hearing they were returned victorious, they went to congratulate them, before they came at the camp: for which there was also another reason, mentioned ver. 19. This shews that Eleazar was not so infirm as some suppose; and affords an argument to strengthen their opinion, who think Joshua was now general of the host; otherwise he would have been mentioned, together with Moses and Eleazar, as going to meet them; being chosen his coadjutor, and therefore superior to all the princes that are here joined with them.

Ver. 14. And Moses was wroth with the officers of the host, with the captains over thousands, and captains over hundreds, which came from the battle.] Who were more to blame than the soldiers, whose duty it was to obey, not to give orders; which they received, no doubt, from the officers, to kill only the men. Here now is an argument to the contrary, that Joshua did not command in chief: but this being only a detachment (as they now speak) from the host of Israel, was led by some inferior officer, the first captain of thousands, perhaps; for if Joshua had been there, Moses would have expostulated with him, or rather, there would have been no cause for this rebuke; he being a man in whom was the spirit, (chap. xxvii. 18.)

Ver. 15. And Moses said unto them, Have ye saved all the women alive?] Unless he had commanded them to be killed, one cannot see that they deserved to be chidden; because they proceeded according to the rules of all worthy warriors, who killed only those who could bear arms against them. But either he had given some directions who should be killed, or he expected they should have considered, that the women had killed more by their blandishments, than their husbands could do by their arms, (for they had not killed one man, ver. 49.) and therefore should have been destroyed, as the most mischievous: for so it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 16. Behold.] Reflect upon what is lately past, and consider.

These caused the children of Israel, through the counsel of Balaam, to commit trespass against the Lord, in the matter of Peor; and there was a plague among the congregation of the Lord.] By these they had been inveigled into a heinous sin, and made obnoxious to a very heavy punishment, which God inflicted upon them on that account. For though the Moabitish women had a great hand in it, (chap. xxv. 1.) yet those of Midian seem to have been the chief seducers, (ver. 6. 17, 18.) and, perhaps, he feared might be so again.

Ver. 17. Now therefore kill every male among the little ones.] That the nation might be extirpated, as far as lay in their power.

And kill every woman that hath known man, by lying with him.] For these, it is to be supposed, had been the most instrumental in the crime beforementioned; either by prostituting themselves, or their daughters, to the lust of the Israelites; and thereby drawing them to idolatry: in which sin they were so settled, that there was no hope of reclaiming them; but they might rather (if they had been saved alive) have enticed the Israelites to commit the same again.

Ver. 18. But all the women-children that have not known a man, by lying with him, keep alive.] Being young, there was some hope they might be brought off from idolatry, and become proselytes to the true religion.

For yourselves.] To be sold as slaves to any other nation, or to be kept as servants, or taken to be their wives, after such preparation as the law required, (Deut. xxi. 16, 17, &c.) This was a peculiar case, wherein a middle course was held between those that were of the seven nations of Canaan, and those that were not. If they were not of those seven nations, the Israelites might take the women and little ones unto themselves: (Deut. xx. 14, 15.) if they were, every thing that breathed was to be destroyed, (ver. 16, 17.) But here the Midianites, being guilty of a very great crime against the Lord, and against his people, are punished more heavily than other nations; though not so heavily as those of Canaan were to be: for they killed all the women that were not virgins, as well as all the males, both little and great; but spared the rest, together with the cattle, &c. Such an execution was made, in aftertimes, upon one of the cities of Israel, upon a high contempt of public authority, in a very great exigency, (Judges xxi. 11.) There is a rule in Deut. xx. 10. that when they came to fight against any city, they should proclaim peace to it; and if they should accept it, they should only make the inhabitants tributaries to them. From whence, a question arising, whether this extended to the seven nations of Canaan? it is resolved by Maimonides, that it did; which he proves from Josh. xi. 19, 20. But so great was the sin of this people, that they neither sent offers of peace to them now, nor were they to make any peace with them hereafter, (Deut. xxiii. 6.) And the reason is there given; because they hired Balaam to curse them: which is as true of the Midianites as of the Moabites. Notwithstanding which, Maimonides determines, that though the Israelites did not send messengers of peace to them; yet if they, of their own accord, sent to desire peace of the Israelites, they were not to reject them: (see Cunæus de Hebr. Repub. lib. ii. cap. 20.)

Ver. 19. And do ye abide without the camp seven days.] As unclean persons. For though it was lawful to kill men, in a just war against them, yet διὰ τὴν ἀνωτάτην καὶ κοινὴν συγγένειαν (as Philo speaks), because of the most ancient and common kindred between all mankind, it was fit men should use some purification to cleanse themselves from that which looked like a crime, though it was none.

Whosoever hath killed any person, and whosoever hath touched any slain, purify both yourselves.] The whole army that went to the war, were to stay without the camp seven days; and such of them as had had their hands in blood, or had touched a dead body, though killed by another, were to use a special purification; which was made by the water of separation, mentioned chap. xix. 9, &c.

And your captives.] Or the prey that they had taken; of garments, and other things, mentioned in the next verse: and so the word is translated ver. 26. For we cannot think that the persons they had taken, being gentiles, were to be purified with that water which was peculiar to the Jews.

On the third day, and on the seventh day.] So the law was, chap. xix. 11, 12. And such purifications were common among the gentiles, especially the Greeks, upon the like occasions, as Mr. Selden observes, (lib. iv. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. ult. Grotius, lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 24. n. 10.) To whom add our late learned Dr. Spencer, lib. iii. dissert. 3. sect. 1. where he takes this to have been a custom, derived from ancient time, before the law of Moses (which may be questioned): and Bonfrerius, upon this place, hath alleged the very same proofs, and several more; particularly this out of the scholiast upon Sophocles, in his Ajax Mastigoph. ἔθος ἦν τοῖς παλαιοῖς ὅτε ἢ φόνον ἀνθρώπου, &c. it was the custom among the ancients, when they either killed a man, or made any other slaughter, to wash their hands in water, εἰς κάθαρσιν μιάσματος, for the purification of the defilement.

Ver. 20. And purify all your raiment, and all that is made of skins, &c.] With the same water of separation, (or else by washing them in running water, as the manner was in other cases, Lev. xi. 32, 33.) for they might all be supposed to be defiled by dead bodies, and so come under the law, (chap. xix. 14.)

Ver. 21. And Eleazar the priest said unto the men of war that went to the battle, This is the ordinance of the law which the Lord commanded Moses.] This law was to be observed hereafter by those who went to war; for though the law before was, as I observed, that he who touched a dead body should be purified with the water of separation; yet nothing is there said of him that killed a man in war, but did not, perhaps, touch his body; which now is brought under the same rule.

Ver. 22, 23. Only the gold, and the silver, the brass, &c. every thing that may abide the fire, ye shall make it go through the fire, &c.] All sorts of metals were to have this peculiar sort of purification; which the other things (mentioned ver. 20.) would not endure. And the same Bonfrerius observes, this was a way of purification among the gentiles as old as Homer's time; but they used sulphur with it. For so he makes Ulysses call to the old women to bring him sulphur, and then fire, that he might fume the house wherein the woers had been killed. Which is observed by Fort. Scacchus also, Myrothec. 2. cap. 30. where he also notes, that Ovid gives a long account why these two, fire and water, were chosen for the instruments of purification, lib. iv. Fastorum; where he saith particularly of fire,

> "Omnia purgat edax ignis, vitiumque metalli > Excoquit."——

Nevertheless it shall be purified with the water of separation.] On the third day, I suppose, before it went through the fire.

And all that abideth not the fire, ye shall make go through the water.] All things that could abide the fire, were to be purified both by that and by the water of separation. And such things as could not abide it, were to be purified, not merely by sprinkling them with the water of separation, but by making them go through the water.

Ver. 24. And ye shall wash your clothes on the seventh day, and ye shall be clean, &c.] Thus he that sprinkled an unclean person with the water of separation, was bound to purify himself, (chap. xix. 19.)

Ver. 25. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] After they were purified, and come into the camp.

Ver. 26. Take the sum of the prey that was taken.] In the Hebrew the words are, take the sum of the prey of the captivity: which, it is plain by what follows, signifies the sum of the prey, and of the captives. For all that they took was of three kinds, (ver. 12.) the persons called captives; the beasts, which are called the prey; and money and goods, (such as are mentioned ver. 20, 21.) which are called the spoil.

Both of man and beast.] Here an account is ordered to be given of two parts of what had been taken; but nothing said of the third (which was the spoil), out of which they who had it made a voluntary oblation, (ver. 50. 53.)

Thou, and Eleazar the priest, and the chief of the fathers.] The same, perhaps, with the heads of the tribes, chap. xxx. 1.

Ver. 27. And divide the prey into two parts, between them that took the war upon them, who went out to the battle, and between all the congregation.] By this partition, a far larger share was given to every one of the warriors, who were but twelve thousand, than to any of their brethren, who were near six hundred thousand: for they had hazarded themselves, which the others had not; who, notwithstanding that, enjoyed some fruit of their labours; because it was a common cause in which they engaged, and the rest seem to have been ready to fight, as well as they, (ver. 3.) This division was made by a special direction of God, but was not the rule in after-ages; as appears from 1 Sam. xxx. 24, 25. nor had been in ancient times, as the Jews interpret Gen. xiv. 24. (See Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 16. p. 747.)

Ver. 28. And levy a tribute unto the Lord of the men of war, &c.] The Lord was their sovereign, and therefore had a tribute due to him, out of that which they had taken in war; as a grateful acknowledgment that they owed their success to him.

One soul of five hundred, both of the persons.] i. e. Of the women and the children.

And of the beeves, and of the asses, and of the sheep.] The Hebrew word tzon signifies goats as well as sheep; and both being here intended, the LXX. express them both. Here is no mention of camels, which it seems their country was not stocked withal at this time: see ver. 34. and what I have noted upon Gen. xxxvii. 25. This tribute to God was but a very small proportion, in comparison with what their kings challenged in following times, if we may believe the Talmudists; who say, they had all the gold and silver, and such rich things that were taken, and half of the rest of the prey, which was divided between them and the people: (see Selden in the place abovenamed.) But anciently they had only the tenth part: (see Gen. xiv. 20.)

Ver. 29. Take it of their half, and give it unto Eleazar the priest, for a heave-offering unto the Lord.] For the maintenance of the priests, among whom this part of the tribute was divided. And it was just a tenth part of what the Levites had, as they had a tenth part of their tithes, which was paid them for their constant support. So the law was, chap. xviii. 21. 24. 26, &c. which was observed in this levy; which is called trumah, as the offering for the making of the sanctuary is called Exod. xxv. 2. where we translate it, as here, a heave-offering.

Ver. 30. And of the children of Israel's half, thou shalt take one portion of fifty, of the persons, of the beeves, &c.] A far larger share is demanded of the people (ten times as much as was paid by the soldiers), because they came more easily by it, without any pains or danger. And they pay it in a very just proportion to the number of those who went to the war, and of those who stayed at home, but were able to go to war, who were above six hundred thousand; (chap. xxvi. 2. 51.) of which twelve thousand, who were employed in this expedition, were the fiftieth part.

And give them to the Levites.] Who were far more numerous than the priests, and therefore had a greater proportion of the tribute.

Which keep the charge of the tabernacle of the Lord.] See chap. i. 50. iii. 6—8.

Ver. 31. And Moses and Eleazar the priest did as the Lord commanded Moses.] This command is peculiarly to Moses, (ver. 25.) but Eleazar was to assist him in the execution of it, (ver. 26.) and accordingly they took the sum of the prey both of man and beast, and divided it between the soldiers and people; and levied a tribute upon each for the Lord, who ordered it to his ministers.

Ver. 32. And the booty, being the rest of the prey, which the men of Israel had caught.] i. e. Besides what was necessarily spent for their subsistence, during the war, and while they lay out of the camp, (ver. 19.)

Was six hundred thousand, and seventy thousand, and five thousand sheep.] A vast stock; far exceeding the number of men of war which were in Israel.

Ver. 33. And threescore and twelve thousand beeves.] It seems their country had good pasture in it, as well as sheepwalks: for, as Arabia Felix, it is certain, had "agros latissimos et fertilissimos," (as Pliny speaks, lib. vi. cap. 28.) most spacious and fertile fields; so Arabia Petræa (in which Midian was) did not wholly want them.

Ver. 34. And threescore and one thousand asses.] The countries about Judea abounding with camels also, particularly Arabia, in which Job had a great number, it may seem strange that we read of none here; especially since they had vast numbers in following times, (Judges vi. 5. vii. 12.) and the Ishmaelites (with whom they were associates in trade) had them long before this time, (Gen. xxxvii. 27. 36.) But it is likely they did not yet find it for their profit to feed camels (of which they learnt to make a traffic afterward), no more than mules, of which we read nothing here, nor indeed in Judea, till the times of David. It may be supposed, that, if they had camels, they were of that kind called dromedaries, which were famous in this country in after-ages, (Isa. lx. 6.) and that the people, who escaped the slaughter, fled away upon them: and that there were other beasts in this country, besides beeves, and asses, and sheep, and goats, seems to be plain from ver. 30. where, after the mention of these, he adds, of all manner of beasts, he should take a portion for the Levites; but of camels or dromedaries, I suppose, none were found.

Ver. 35. And thirty-two thousand persons in all, of women that had not known man, &c.] It appears by this to have been a very populous country, in which were so many virgins.

Ver. 36. And the half which was the portion of them that went out to war, was in number three hundred and seven-and-thirty thousand and five hundred sheep.] There is no difficulty in this, or in the following verses; this being exactly the half of the whole number of sheep mentioned ver. 32.

Ver. 37. And the Lord's tribute of the sheep was six hundred and threescore and fifteen.] Which is exactly one in five hundred, out of this half of the booty; as God ordered, ver. 28.

Ver. 38. And the beeves were thirty and six thousand, whereof the tribute was threescore and twelve.] The very same proportions are observed here, as in the sheep, which appears by comparing this verse with ver. 33. And the two next verses (39, 40.) give the same account of the asses and the persons, which were as exactly divided; and the Lord had the same portion of them, as ver. 34, 35. compared with these, demonstrate.

Ver. 41. And Moses gave the tribute which was the Lord's heave-offering unto Eleazar the priest, &c.] This is recorded to shew how faithful Moses was in performing obedience to God's commands, (ver. 29.) and far from desiring the smallest portion for himself out of so great a booty: which, if he had acted by his own private spirit, he would scarce have avoided.

Ver. 42. And the children of Israel's half, which Moses divided from the men that warred.] There is nothing here, nor in the following verses, to ver. 48. but a repetition of what was said concerning the other half beforementioned; to shew that the same exactness was observed both in the division of the prey among the people, and in taking out of it such a portion as God assigned to the Levites; which was one out of fifty; as out of the men of war's part, one out of five hundred, (ver. 28. 30.)

Ver. 48. And the officers which were over thousands of the host, the captains of thousands, and captains of hundreds, came near unto Moses.] The first words of this verse seem to suppose, that there were other great officers, as well as the general, who were above the captains over thousands, and the captains over hundreds: which is very probable.

Ver. 49. And they said unto Moses, Thy servants, &c.] The greatest men speak with the greatest reverence to Moses; who was in the place of God.

Have taken the sum of the men of war which are under our charge.] Made a muster of them (as we now speak) at our return from the war.

And there lacketh not one man of us.] A wonderful victory; which shews the war was the Lord's, (ver. 3.) who struck such a terror into them, that one would think they turned their backs, and did not strike a stroke against the Israelites.

Ver. 50. We have therefore brought an oblation for the Lord.] For the uses of the sanctuary; either in purchasing sacrifices, or maintaining God's ministers, &c. For korban signifies every thing that is given to God, though not sacrificed upon the altar.

What every man hath gotten.] All of them offered something to the Lord out of the spoil he had gotten, according to the piety of ancient times, (Gen. xiv. 20.) For we find no precept in the law for this; and yet it was constantly practised by David in aftertimes, (2 Sam. viii. 11, 12.) and by the officers of his army, (1 Chron. xxvi. 26, 27.) and by other men, Samuel, Saul, Abner, &c. (ver. 28, &c.)

Jewels of gold.] Vessels, as the Hebrew word signifies, or all manner of ornaments made of gold; the particulars of which follow, viz. chains, bracelets, &c. but the Jerusalem Targum takes these jewels (as we translate it) to have been the golden attire about the heads of their women.

Chains.] These are commonly thought to have been the ornaments of their arms. But they may as well be thought to have been used about their legs, or their necks.

Bracelets.] These, it is apparent, were ornaments about their wrists or hands, (Gen. xxiv. 47. Ezek. xvi. 11.)

Rings.] They were ornaments of the fingers, (Gen. xli. 42. Esther iii. 10.)

Ear-rings.] Nothing more common in those countries, especially among the Midianites and Ishmaelites; as we find Judges viii. 24—26. where there is a different word used to express this ornament; yet the word hagil, here used, certainly signifying something round, and the ornaments encompassing the arms and other parts being before mentioned, it cannot well be thought to denote any thing but rings in the ears. And so we translate it, Ezek. xvi. 12.

And tablets.] Some ornaments about the breasts. (See Exod. xxxv. 22.)

To make an atonement of our souls before the Lord.] For the guilt of which Moses accused them, ver. 14. or any other, which they had contracted in the war.

Ver. 52. And all the gold of the offering which they offered up to the Lord, &c. was sixteen thousand seven hundred and fifty shekels.] It hath been observed before, that three thousand shekels made a talent: and therefore their offering amounted to above five talents and a half.

Ver. 53. For the men of war had taken spoil, every man for himself.] Or rather, had taken the spoil, mentioned ver. 12. of which part of the booty no division was made between the men of war and the people, (ver. 26.) but they kept it entirely to themselves, and now very gratefully made a present of a very considerable part of it to the Lord: see ver. 12. where the word spoil is used strictly for a part of the booty, distinct from the other two, the captives and the prey: and so it signifies here.

Ver. 54. And Moses and Eleazar the priest took the gold.] This was said before, (ver. 51.) and therefore the sense here is, that, having received it as an offering to the Lord, they brought it into the tabernacle of the congregation; as it here follows in the conclusion of this verse.

Of the captains of thousands and of hundreds.] It was not their oblation only, but the oblation of every one of the men of war, (ver. 50, 51.) But the commanders received it from the common soldiers, and presented it unto Moses and Eleazar, from the whole host.

And brought it into the tabernacle, for a memorial for the children of Israel before the Lord.] That God might be mindful of them, i. e. propitious to them, who were so grateful to him for his benefits.

The Jerusalem Targum upon ver. 50. fancies these officers to have represented to Moses their great chastity, when they made this offering; saying, "We broke into the chambers and closets of the kings of Midian; and there we saw their beautiful and charming daughters, from whom we took the golden ornaments upon their heads, and in their ears, and on their arms, their fingers, and breasts; but did not cast a wanton look upon one of them:" and therefore they hoped this oblation they made would rise up for them, in the day of the great judgment, as a reconciliation for their souls before the Lord.

CHAP. XXXII.

Ver. 1. NOW the children of Reuben, and the children of Gad.] Here the children of Reuben, who was Jacob's firstborn, are mentioned in the first place; but in the rest of the chapter (ver. 2. 6. 25. 29. 32.) the children of Gad are constantly first mentioned, because they were the first movers of that which follows, as the Hebrews conjecture.

Had a very great multitude of cattle.] More than any other tribe.

And when they saw the land of Jazer.] Which was lately taken from the Amorites, after they had slain Sihon their king, (chap. xxi. 32.) This city and country belonging to it, were near to the spring of the river Arnon; and there is frequent mention of it in the book of Joshua, and in Isaiah xvi. 8, 9. and Jeremiah xlviii. 34.

And the land of Gilead.] A noble country, so called from the mountain Gilead, which bounded it on the east, as Jordan did on the west, the river Jabbok on the south, and Mount Libanus on the north.

That, behold, the place was a place of cattle.] Which in the fourth verse is called a land of cattle, γῆν κτηνοτρόφον, as the LXX. translate it, fit for feeding of cattle; being famous for pasture and other grazing ground. For Bashan was in this country, (Deut. iii. 12, 13.) where every one knows the largest and fattest oxen were bred, (Psalm xxii. 12.) and sheep also, (Deut. xxxii. 14.) and therefore is joined with Gilead, (Micah vi. 14.) which, being woody and mountainous in some part of it, was no less famous for breeding goats, (see Cantic. iv. 1.) which delight to browse on such trees as Mount Gilead abounded withal. (See Bochartus in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 51.)

Ver. 2. And the children of Gad, and the children of Reuben.] Neither here, nor in the foregoing verse, is there any mention of the children of Manasseh (half of which had their portion in this country), because they were neither the contrivers nor movers of this; but it is most probable had a lot assigned them here, because these countries were too much for the other two tribes alone; and they of Manasseh had much cattle also.

Came and spake unto Moses and Eleazar, and the princes of the congregation.] Who were wont often to assemble to dispatch public affairs, (chap. xxvii. 2. xxx. 1.)

Ver. 3. Ataroth.] A place which was part of the portion of Gad; as appears by ver. 34.

And Dibon.] This is mentioned as a place in the kingdom of Sihon, chap. xxi. 30. and was given to Gad also; as we read ver. 34.

And Jazer.] See ver. 1. and 35. where we find this also belonged unto Gad.

And Nimrah.] Called Beth-Nimrah, ver. 36. and given to the same tribe. It is usual, I observed before, for the Hebrews to cut off the first part of the names of places, for brevity's sake, (chap. xxv. 1.) but this place is elsewhere called at length Beth-Nimrah, Josh. xiii. 27. where it is mentioned as a part of Sihon's kingdom, and signifies as much as domus pardorum, a habitation of leopards: so Bochartus, who observes, that when both Isaiah xv. 6. and Jeremiah xlviii. 34. speak of the waters of Nimrim, they mean this very place, which was given to Gad; but, in the days of those prophets, mentioned as in the country of the Moabites; who had usurped upon their neighbours the Gadites, and taken this place from them, as they had done Jazer also; as appears from the place abovementioned, (Isa. xvi. 8, 9. Jerem. xlviii. 34.)

And Heshbon.] The principal city of Sihon king of the Amorites, (chap. xxi. 26—28.) and was given to the Reubenites, (ver. 37.)

And Elealah.] This is frequently mentioned with Heshbon, as a place adjoining to it, (ver. 37. Isa. xvi. 9.)

And Sheban.] Called also Shibmah, ver. 37. and Sibmah, Isa. xvi. 8, 9. Jer. xlviii. 31. where it appears to have been a place famous for vines; and in the days of that prophet was fallen into the hands of the Moabites, as were Heshbon and Elealah also.

And Nebo.] Which was given to the Reubenites, (ver. 38.)

And Beon.] There is no mention of this place any where else; but it is probable was part of the Reubenites' portion, being mentioned together with other places that were given unto them; and possibly may be the place called Baal-Meon, (ver. 38.) which they changed into Beon, because of the name of Baal; but the Moabites, when it fell into their hands, restored part of its old name, calling it Beth-Meon, (Jer. xlviii. 23.)

Ver. 4. Even the country which the Lord smote before the congregation of Israel.] And gave it to them for a possession, as he intended to do the land of Canaan: (see chap. xxi. 24, 25.

Is a land for cattle, and thy servants have cattle.] Is very fit for us, (ver. 2.)

Ver. 5. Wherefore, said they, if we have found grace in thy sight.] A phrase often used by humble petitioners; even by Moses himself, when he speaks to God, chap. xi. 15.

Let this land be given unto thy servants for a possession.] The Israelites in common possessed it hitherto, as belonging to them all, (chap. xxi. ult.) but they desire to have it assigned to them, as their particular portion.

And bring us not over Jordan.] We desire nothing in the land of Canaan.

Ver. 6. And Moses said unto the children of Gad, and the children of Reuben, Shall your brethren go to war.] Can you think it reasonable, that the rest of the tribes should fight still for what they are to possess?

And shall ye sit here?] And you take up your rest here, and settle in their conquests, which they have already made?

Ver. 7. And wherefore discourage ye the hearts of the children of Israel, from going over into the land which the Lord hath given them?] He seems to have suspected that mere cowardice, and a vile love of ease, made them desire to stay where they were, and go no further: which ill example might dishearten all the rest of their brethren, and make them have the same inclination to settle in the land they had conquered; and not engage in a war with the Canaanites.

Ver. 8. Thus did your fathers.] i. e. They disheartened all their brethren.

When I sent them from Kadesh-barnea to see the land.] See chap. xiii. 3. 26.

Ver. 9. For when they went up unto the valley of Eshcol.] Men do not go up into a valley; therefore the meaning is, they went up to search the country, (as it is said they did, chap. xiii. 21, 22.) and went on in their search, till they came to the valley or brook of Eshcol, chap. xiii. 23. where they cut down a branch with a cluster of grapes, to shew what fruit the country afforded.

And saw the land.] Had taken a full view of the country.

They discouraged the hearts of the children of Israel.] Represented the people and the cities to be so strong, that they should not be able to deal with them, (chap. xiii. 28, 29.)

That they should not go into the land which the Lord had given them.] And, therefore, persuaded them not to attempt to possess themselves of it. For they said expressly, "We are not able to go against the people, for they are stronger than we," (chap. xiii. 31.)

Ver. 10. And the Lord's anger was kindled at the same time, and he sware, saying.] See chap. xiv. 21. 28.

Ver. 11. Surely none of the men that are come out of Egypt, from twenty years old and upward.] See chap. xiv. 22. 29. 35.

Shall see the land which I sware unto Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.] See chap. xiv. 23.

Because they have not wholly followed me.] See there, ver. 22.

Ver. 12. Save Caleb the son of Jephunneh.] See chap. xiv. 24.

The Kenezite.] A great deal has been said by many to prove that Caleb is called a Kenezite, because his father's name was Kenaz. And this they prove, because Othniel's father was Kenaz, and he was Caleb's brother, (Josh. xv. 17.) his younger brother, (Judg. i. 13. iii. 9.) So that their father must have two names, Kenaz and Jephunneh. But it is very strange, if this be true, that Caleb is no where called the son of Kenaz, but constantly the son of Jephunneh, (even there where Othniel is just before called the son of Kenaz, 1 Chron. iv. 13. 15.) nor is Othniel any where called the son of Jephunneh, but always of Kenaz. And, indeed, there is a demonstration against this opinion; for Othniel married Caleb's daughter, which by the law of Moses was utterly unlawful, whatsoever the practice might have been before the law was given. Therefore, others think it more probable, that Othniel was one of his brother's younger sons (for uncles and nephews are often called brethren, as Abraham and Lot were), and that from this brother, whose name was Kenaz, Caleb is also called a Kenezite: but this is very absurd; for the name of Kenezzi in the Hebrew, denotes the descendants from one who gave this denomination to the family; which one brother could not do to another. It is most probable, therefore, that Kenez was some common ancestor both of Othniel and Caleb, from whom Othniel's father took also his name. Accordingly, we find Jephunneh called a Kenezite in Joshua xiv. 14. where it is said, that "Hebron became the inheritance of Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenezite."

And Joshua the son of Nun: for they have followed the Lord.] Fully, chap. xiv. 24. 30. 38.

Ver. 13. And the Lord's anger was kindled against Israel.] He had said this before, (ver. 10.) but repeats it again, to make them the more sensible of a thing that was done thirty-eight years ago; and to deter them from giving him the like provocation.

And he made them wander in the wilderness forty years, till all that had done evil in the sight of the Lord were consumed.] See chap. xiv. 31—33. xxvi. 64, 65.

Ver. 14. And, behold.] Mark what I say.

You are risen up in your fathers' stead, an increase of sinful men, to augment yet the fierce anger of the Lord towards Israel.] Are multiplied to as great a number as your fathers, only to succeed them in their sins, and thereby bring down still more heavy punishments upon the nation.

Ver. 15. For if ye turn away from after him.] As your fathers did; who refused to go and possess the good land which he had bestowed upon them.

He will yet again leave them in the wilderness.] Lead them back again into the desert, where your fathers perished; and there forsake you.

And ye shall destroy all this people.] Who, following your example, will refuse to go over Jordan, (ver. 5.) to take possession of the land of Canaan.

Ver. 16. And they drew near unto him.] As petitioners are wont to do when they are assured of their integrity, and hope to obtain their request, (Gen. xliv. 19.)

And said, We will build sheepfolds here for our cattle.] There are five words in the Hebrew language for folds for sheep and cattle; all signifying a place fenced in, that they might lie safely and be defended from wild beasts. And so this word gedera plainly imports: (see Bochartus in his Hierozoic. par. i. lib. i. cap. 45.)

And cities for our little ones.] Which stood in need only of repairing and fortifying, (ver. 17.) for they already dwelt in those cities of the Amorites, (chap. xxi. 25.)

Ver. 17. But we ourselves will go ready armed before the children of Israel, until we have brought them unto their place.] That is, a considerable number of them, as many as should be thought necessary, (Deut. iii. 18.) in all forty thousand, (Josh. iv. 12.)

And our little ones shall dwell in the fenced cities.] Where it was necessary to leave some men to guard them from their bad neighbours, and to take care of their cattle.

Because of the people of the land.] That is, the Moabites, who were the ancient owners of this country, (chap. xxi. 26.) and the Edomites, who had shewed no good-will to the Israelites, as they passed through the wilderness.

Ver. 18. We will not return unto our houses, until the children of Israel have inherited every man his inheritance.] Be settled in the possession of the land of Canaan, as we desire to be in this country.

Ver. 19. For we will not inherit with them on yonder side Jordan, or forward.] We will not desire any share in the country beyond Jordan, though it lie near to us; nor in that country which lies still further westward.

Because our inheritance is fallen on this side Jordan eastward.] We look upon this as our inheritance (with which we shall be fully satisfied), here in the land of Gilead: which lay eastward of Jordan, and of the land of Canaan.

Ver. 20. And Moses said unto them, If ye will do this thing.] Be as good as your word.

If ye will go armed before the Lord to war.] To go before the Lord, was to go before the ark; which was the symbol of God's presence, over which his glory resided. And it is to be observed, that these two tribes, Reuben and Gad (together with Simeon), always lay encamped before the sanctuary; as appears from the second chapter of this book, ver. 10. 14—17. And accordingly, when the camp removed, they marched immediately before it; as is particularly noted, chap. x. 18—21. So that here he requires them only to hold their usual place, when they went to the war against the Canaanites; and accordingly it is expressly said, they did (together with half the tribe of Manasseh, who were joined with them) pass over before the Lord unto battle, Josh. iv. 12, 13.

Ver. 21. And will go all of you.] As many as shall be required, and can be spared, (ver. 17.)

Armed over Jordan before the Lord, until he hath driven out his enemies from before him.] Not only bring us into Canaan, but continue with us, till we have expelled the inhabitants of that country: which he encourages them to undertake, by representing the Canaanites as the enemies of the Lord, who would therefore fight for them.

Ver. 22. And the land be subdued before the Lord.] By this expression, and that in the foregoing words, it appears that the ark was carried along with them to the war every where till it was ended; as it was when it begun, at the taking of Jericho, (Josh. vi. 6, 7, &c.)

Then afterward ye shall return, and be guiltless before the Lord, and before Israel; and this land shall be your possession.] Not only be free from all blame in this desire, but have what you desire.

Before the Lord.] By his order and appointment.

Ver. 23. But if you will not do so.] If this be not your intention; or if you go back from your word.

Behold.] Observe what I say.

Ye have sinned against the Lord; and be sure your sin will find you out.] Your guilt is exceeding great, and shall be most certainly punished, as it deserves.

Ver. 24. Build ye cities for your little ones, and folds for your sheep, &c.] As for the rest of their proposals, about their children and cattle, he consented to them, without any exception.

Ver. 25. And the children of Gad, and the children of Reuben, spake unto Moses, saying.] The word for spake, in the Hebrew, being jomer, in the singular number, instead of jomru, in the plural, their doctors take it for an indication that some one principal person spake in the name of all the rest. But there is no need of this; for the singular number in this language is often used for the plural; and they never spake all of them together, but some one in the name of their brethren. And it had been better, if they had observed, that this signifies one and all (as we now speak) were of the same mind.

Thy servants will do as my lord commandeth.] And as they themselves had proposed, (ver. 17.)

Ver. 26. Our little ones, our wives, our flocks, and all our cattle, shall be there in the cities of Gilead.] Here they promise to leave all that was dear to them in this country, and go to serve their brethren.

Ver. 27. But thy servants will pass over every man armed for war, &c.] We ourselves will go and fight for our brethren. It hath been often said (ver. 17. 21.) that this doth not signify all the men of war among them should go, but as many as could be spared, and as were thought sufficient. For it is manifest, the far greater half of them were left in this country to defend their wives and children, and look after their flocks and herds; as will appear by computing all the men of war that were found in the tribes of Gad and of Reuben, which were above fourscore and four thousand, (chap. xxvi. 7. 18.) to which if we add half the tribe of Manasseh (who were, in all, above fifty-two thousand), there were much above a hundred thousand men able to bear arms; and not above forty thousand of them marched into Canaan, as was before observed.

Ver. 28. So concerning them, Moses commanded Eleazar the priest, and Joshua the son of Nun, and the chief fathers of the tribes of Israel.] He left this in charge with the principal persons, who had the government of affairs under him; particularly with Joshua, who was not unmindful of it, but remembered these tribes what Moses had said when he was about to attempt the conquest of Canaan, (Josh. i. 13, 14, &c.)

Ver. 29. And Moses said unto them, If the children of Gad and the children of Reuben will pass with you over Jordan, &c.] He repeats to these great men, who were to see it executed, what he had said to the Gadites and Reubenites themselves, (ver. 21, 22.)

Then ye shall give them the land of Gilead for a possession.] They had not a right to it till they had performed the condition upon which it was granted, viz. till their brethren were in possession of their inheritance in the land of Canaan.

Ver. 30. But if they will not pass over before you armed.] Perform their promise, ver. 17.

They shall have possession among you in the land of Canaan.] Take what falls to their share there; and this country be disposed of, as God shall order.

Ver. 31. And the children of Gad, and the children of Reuben said, As the Lord hath said unto thy servants, so will we do.] They confirm what they had promised to Moses, ver. 25. and here take all that he had said, as spoken by the order of God, who bestowed this land upon them on the condition often mentioned.

Ver. 32. We will pass over armed before the Lord into the land of Canaan.] This they offered at first of themselves, (ver. 17.) and solemnly promised, when Moses accepted their proposal, (ver. 27.) and again here ratify and confirm it before Eleazar, and Joshua, and all the princes, (ver. 28.)

That the possession of our inheritance.] Which we have desired to have for our inheritance.

On this side Jordan.] They were now in the land of Gilead, and so might properly call it on this side Jordan; but when they were in the land of Canaan, it was said to be on that side Jordan.

May be ours.] Settled upon us and our posterity.

Ver. 33. And Moses gave unto them.] Not an absolute grant, but a conditional; if they did as they engaged, (ver. 29—31, &c.)

Even to the children of Gad, and the children of Reuben, and half the tribe of Manasseh the son of Joseph.] This half tribe is not mentioned before, because they did not put in any claim till they saw how those of Gad and Reuben would succeed in their petition: which being granted, it is likely that thereupon they represented also what store of cattle they had; and that the country would be more than enough for those who had desired it. This being found to be true, Moses thought fit to give them a portion in it, rather than any other; because the children of Machir, the son of Manasseh, had, by their valour, subdued part of this country, (ver. 39. Josh. xvii. 1.)

The kingdom of Sihon king of the Amorites, and the kingdom of Og king of Bashan.] See chap. xxi. 24. 29. Which were the first countries that the Israelites possessed; and were the first that were carried captive out of their land, (2 Kings xv. 29.)

The land with the cities thereof in the coasts, even the cities of the country round about.] The land with the cities, within such a compass or limits; and all the towns within that circuit.

Ver. 34. And the children of Gad built Dibon and Ataroth.] Repaired and fortified these towns, which are mentioned before, ver. 3. for they were not destroyed, but only their inhabitants, (Deut. ii. 34, 35.) and if they had, there was not time now to rebuild them. Thus Jeroboam is said to have built Shechem, (1 Kings xii. 25.) which was a city before, but gone to decay; and Azariah to have built Elah, (2 Kings xiv. 22.) which he restoreth to Judah as a city formerly belonging to them.

And Aroer.] A city of the Amorites, upon the brink of the river Arnon; as Moses tells us, Deut. ii. 36. iii. 11. iv. 48. It formerly belonged to the Moabites, but was taken from them by Sihon.

Ver. 35. And Atroth, and Shophan, and Jaazer, and Jogbehah.] We do not read of any of these towns elsewhere, but only of Jaazer, which seems to be that called Jazer, ver. 3.

Ver. 36. And Beth-Nimrah.] Called, ver. 3. Nimrah for shortness' sake; as (it may be further observed) Jemini is put for Benjemini, Esther ii. 5. Sheba for Beer-sheba, Josh. xix. 2. where we find these two mentioned; but they do not signify two several cities, but are two names for one and the same city; as if he had said, Beer-sheba, which is also called Sheba. This is clear to a demonstration; for otherwise there would be more than thirteen cities in the tribe of Simeon, contrary to ver. 6. of that chapter.

And Beth-haran.] A place, some say, between Dibon and Jordan.

Fenced cities, and folds for sheep.] All these cities the children of Gad fortified, and built folds for sheep in the pastures near to them.

Ver. 37. And the children of Reuben built.] Repaired and fortified; as I said, ver. 34.

Heshbon and Elealah.] Mentioned above, ver. 3.

And Kirjathaim.] A place where giant-like people formerly dwelt, called Emims, Gen. xiv. 5. who were expelled by the Moabites, as they were by the Amorites.

Ver. 38. And Nebo.] This city is mentioned in Jerem. xlviii. 2. when it was fallen again into the possession of the Moabites, as was also Kirjathaim. It seems to have been near Dibon, mentioned together with it, Isa. xv. 1. At least there were in these places two famous temples; for the destruction of which, the prophet represents the people making lamentation. So the LXX. ἀπολεῖται ὁ Νεβῶν, οὗ ὁ βωμὸς ὑμῶν, Nebo is destroyed where your altar is. And Hesychius saith of Δεηβὼν (i. e. Dibon), that it was τόπος ἔνθα ἵδρυται ἱερὸν Μοαβήτων, a place where a temple of the Moabites was built. And St. Jerome suspects that there was an oracle at this place; the word Nebo importing prophecy, or divination, as he speaks.

And Baal-Meon.] Another place, where, it is likely, Baal was worshipped; which made them change the names of these places, as it here follows.

Their names being changed.] For Nebo, as well as Baal, was the name of a god; as we learn from Isaiah xlvi. 1. and seems to have been an Assyrian deity; there being footsteps of it in the names of several great men there; such as Nebuchadnezzar, Nebuzaradan, and many others. And it is not unlikely, that they therefore changed the names of these cities into some other, because they would abolish all remainders of idolatry in this country, according to the precept, Exod. xxiii. 13. that they should not take the name of their gods into their mouth: but, notwithstanding this, they still retained their ancient names; as appears from Josh. xiii. 17. Ezek. xxv. 9. so hard it is to alter any thing for the better!

And Sibmah.] See ver. 3.

And gave other names unto the cities which they builded.] If this refer to all the cities here mentioned, it is manifest they either retained or recovered their former names: for we read of them all in future times; particularly in the fifteenth and eighteenth chapters of Isaiah; and Kirjathaim is mentioned in the place I now quoted out of Ezekiel.

Ver. 39. And the children of Machir the son of Manasseh went to Gilead, and took it.] Here Gilead is used in a strict sense, not so largely as before, ver. 1. 26. 29. where it is taken for all the country on that side Jordan where Gilead was; but here, for a part of it about Mount Gilead. This is plain from the next verse; and Gilead the son of Machir, one would think, was the person that took it, (Josh. xvii. 1.)

Ver. 40. And Moses gave Gilead unto Machir, the son of Manasseh.] i. e. To the children of Machir (for he was dead long ago), who had a considerable portion of that half of the land of Gilead, which was given to the half tribe of Manasseh. For one half was given to the Reubenites and Gadites, and the other half to them, Deut. iii. 12, 13. where Gilead signifies all that country properly so called; neither so much as the whole territory, which these tribes demanded, ver. 1. nor so little as was given to Machir, ver. 15. where Moses says, "And I gave Gilead unto Machir;" i. e. to that family of Manasseh, which were properly called Machirites, Numb. xxvi. 29. and to that family descended from his son, which from him were called Gileadites. For as Manasseh had only this son Machir, so Machir had only Gilead; but he had many, (chap. xxvi. 30—32.) who all raised families. And as to the Machirites (and I suppose the Gileadites) was given a portion in this country, (Josh. xiii. 29, 30, &c.) so Joshua gave to the rest an inheritance in the land of Canaan, (chap. xvii. 2.) And he gives a reason, in the foregoing verse, why he gave Gilead and Bashan to the posterity of Machir, because they were a warlike people, inheriting their father's valour, who was a man of war; and therefore fit to be placed in the frontiers of that country.

Ver. 41. And Jair, the son of Manasseh.] One of the posterity of Manasseh, by his mother's side: for he was the grandson of Gilead, the son of Machir, by his daughter, (1 Chron. ii. 21, 22.) but his father was of the tribe of Judah. It seems he joined with the children of Machir in their expedition against Gilead, (mentioned ver. 39.) and was so successful, that he took several small towns in that country, and so had his inheritance among the children of Manasseh, on this side Jordan, where they now were. There were threescore of them in the whole, which were afterward called cities, (Josh. xiii. 13. 1 Kings iv. 23.) but he had only twenty-three for his possession, (1 Chron. ii. 22, 23.)

And called them Havoth-Jair.] That is, the habitations of Jair. For havah is a dwelling, as Bochartus observes in his Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 29. And among the Arabians the word Havoth properly signifies many tents orderly disposed in a ring or circle; which in those countries made that which we call a village. For hava in their language signifies to compass. The same he observes in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 44. p. 466.

Ver. 42. And Nobah.] Who he was we find in no other place; but an eminent person, no doubt, in some of the families of the Manassites; either of the Machirites or the Gileadites. For they only, as I take it, inherited on this side Jordan.

Went and took Kenath, and the villages thereof.] At the same time, I suppose, that Jair took the towns abovementioned; of which this was one, (1 Chron. ii. 23.) But, though Jair was the chief conductor in that expedition, yet he kept, as I said, only twenty-three towns to himself: the rest were given to them who accompanied him, of whom, it is probable, Nobah was one.

And called it Nobah, after his own name.] But it retained its old name also: for St. Jerome says, in his time there was a city called Canatha, in the region of Trachonitis, not far from Bosra.

Thus this country being settled upon these two tribes and a half, the land of Canaan was divided, by God's command, for an inheritance to the remaining nine tribes, and the other half of the tribe of Manasseh, (Josh. xiii. 7.)

CHAP. XXXIII.

Ver. 1. THESE are the journeys of the children of Israel, which went forth out of the land of Egypt.] A brief recapitulation of the travels of the children of Israel through the wilderness; whereby the wonderful providence of God over them appears, in their protection and preservation, from the time they departed out of Egypt, till they came to the borders of the land of Canaan.

With their armies.] For they marched in an orderly manner, as armies do. (See Exod. xii. 41. 51. xiii. 18.)

Under the hand of Moses and Aaron.] By whom they were conducted, as the ministers of God, (Exod. xii. 1. 28. 50.)

Ver. 2. And Moses wrote their goings out according to their journeys.] Every removal which they made from the place where they were, unto another whither they journeyed.

By the commandment of the Lord.] This may refer either to their journeys, (which were by God's commandment, chap. x. 13.) or rather to Moses's writing this epitome of their travels, of which God ordered him to give a distinct account: which was no unnecessary work, but most useful to posterity; there being no history extant in the world, as David Chytræus well observes (except that of the birth, life, death, and resurrection of Christ), which contains so many wonderful instances of Divine providence, as this of bringing the children of Israel out of Egypt, and leading them through the Red Sea, and through the wilderness; concerning which Maimonides hath an excellent discourse in his third part of More Nevochim, cap. 50. the substance of which is this: that it being impossible any miracles should continue throughout all generations, due care should be taken that the memory of them be not lost, but faithfully preserved by the history and narration of them in future times. Now there being no greater miracle than the subsistence of the children of Israel in the desert for forty years; a desert full of scorpions and serpents, destitute of water, uninhabited, through which no man had been wont to pass, as Jeremiah speaks, chap. ii. 6. where they ate no bread, nor drank wine, or strong drink, (Deut. xxix. 6, &c.) God would have the particular places set down distinctly where they pitched in that howling wilderness; that all men might be satisfied (who would take the pains to examine things), by what a marvellous providence such a multitude of people were fed every day for forty years together; and none might be able to cavil and say, that they travelled through a country good enough, and pitched in habitable places, where they might plough, and sow, and reap; or where they might have herbs and roots for their sustenance; or where manna ordinarily came down from the clouds for men's support.

And these are their journeys according to their goings out.] As if he had said, Having received this commandment from God, this is a true and exact account, which here follows, of their travels from place to place.

Ver. 3. And they departed from Rameses.] See Exod. xii. 37. Here, in all likelihood, they sacrificed the paschal lamb, and were preserved from the destroying angel; which made this place very remarkable: for they seem to have been all summoned hither, to meet here as in a common rendezvous (as they now speak), to be ready to march away when God gave the word of command.

In the first month, on the fifteenth day of the first month, on the morrow after the Passover.] Which they had kept in Egypt on the fourteenth, (Exod. xii. 46.)

The children of Israel went out of Egypt with a high hand.] Exod. xiv. 8.

In the sight of the Egyptians.] Who thrust them out, (Exod. xii. 39.)

Ver. 4. For the Egyptians buried all their first-born.] They were so terrified with the sudden death of all their first-born, that they pressed them to be gone, lest they should be slain also, (Exod. xii. 33.) And were so employed in mourning for them, and giving them decent burial, that they thought not of pursuing the Israelites till some days after.

Which the Lord had smitten among them.] At midnight, between the fourteenth and fifteenth days, (Exod. xii. 29.)

Upon their gods also the Lord executed judgment.] Which still more astonished them, (Exod. xii. 12. xviii. 11. 2 Sam. vii. 23.) just as he did with Babylon afterward, (Isa. xxi. 9.)

Ver. 5. And the children of Israel removed from Rameses, and pitched in Succoth.] Exod. xii. 37. Here they received the command to set apart all the first-born unto the Lord, in memory of God's sparing them when he slew all the first-born of the Egyptians, (Exod. xiii. 1. 12, 13, &c.)

Ver. 6. And they departed from Succoth, and pitched in Etham, &c.] See Exod. xiii. 20. where it immediately follows, that they were conducted hither by a miraculous cloud, which ever after led them in all their journeys.

Ver. 7. And they removed from Etham, and turned again unto Pi-hahiroth.] So it is expressly recorded, Exod. xiv. 2. Hither they were led on purpose, that they might see the wonderful power and goodness of God, in a place where they had high mountains on each side of them, and the army of Pharaoh behind them, and the Red Sea before them, through which God made them a passage, rather than let them fall again under the Egyptian tyranny. Here is also the singular number for the plural, in the word turned again, (as was observed before in another word, chap. xxxii. 25.) but the observation of the Hebrew doctors upon it seems to be frivolous, "That with one heart they did what Moses commanded."

Which is before Baal-Zephon, and they pitched before Migdol.] This is explained in Exod. xiv. 2.

Ver. 8. And they departed from before Pi-hahiroth, and passed through the midst of the sea.] See Exod. xiv. 23. Where Pharaoh and his host were drowned; as they could not but call to mind when they read this brief history: which, it might be expected, would also call to remembrance their own distrust of God, notwithstanding which he most graciously delivered them, (Exod. xiv. 11, 12, &c.)

Into the wilderness, and went three days' journey in the wilderness of Etham.] Called in Exod. xv. 22. the wilderness of Shur: where they were very much distressed for want of water.

And pitched in Marah.] Where God obliged them, by a new miracle, in making the bitter water sweet, (Exod. xv. 23. 25.)

Ver. 9. And they removed from Marah, and came to Elim; and in Elim were twelve fountains of water, &c.] See Exod. xv. ult.

Ver. 10. And they removed from Elim, and encamped by the Red Sea.] Not by that part of it, where they lately came out of it; but by a more southerly part of it, where it bends towards Arabia. For the Red Sea, which Ptolemy calls the Arabian Gulf, runs a long way, like the Adriatic, now called the Gulf of Venice, or the Baltic Sea, as David Chytræus observes; who compares these three together as much of a length, and all in some places broader, and some narrower. This station is not mentioned in the book of Exodus.

camped in the wilderness of Sin.] Exod. xvi. 1. where manna first began to rain upon them, with which God fed them forty years.

Ver. 12. And they took their journey out of the wilderness of Sin, and encamped in Dophkah.] This and the next station (Alush) are not mentioned in Exodus; because nothing remarkable (it is supposed) fell out in these two places, as there did in the next; and they made no long stay there.

Ver. 13. And they departed from Dophkah, and encamped in Alush.] The Jewish doctors find something remarkable here, though Moses saith nothing of it. For, as the sabbath was first commanded at Marah, which was their fifth station, so it was first observed here at Alush, as they fancy, which was their tenth. And more than that, this was the only sabbath, in their opinion, which they exactly kept; the very next being profaned. (See Selden, lib. iii. de Jure Nat. et Gentium, &c. cap. 11. and lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 1.) The author of Sepher Cosri saith, the ancient tradition is, "that at this place the manna first descended," (par. ii. sect. 20.)

Ver. 14. And they removed from Alush, and encamped at Rephidim.] See Exod. xvii. 1.

Where was no water for the people to drink.] And thereby an occasion given to the Almighty Goodness to shew his wonderful power, in bringing water out of a rock for them, (ver. 5, 6.) And here also "Amalek lay in wait for Israel, in the way when they came out of Egypt," (1 Sam. xv. 2.) and smote some that lagged behind, (Deut. xxv. 16.) but were vanquished by Joshua in a pitched battle. (Exod. xvii. 8, 9, &c.) And here Jethro also came to see Moses, and gave him advice about the government of the people with more ease both to himself and them, (Exod. xviii.)

Ver. 15. And they departed from Rephidim, and pitched in the wilderness of Sinai.] Exod. xix. 1, 2. This was forty-seven days after they came from Rameses, on the first day of the third month; three days after which (viz. on the fiftieth day after they came out of Egypt) God gave them his law from Mount Sinai; where Moses was called up to him, and stayed with him twice forty days; and was instructed there how to make the tabernacle, and set it up when it was made, with all the furniture belonging to it. All sorts of sacrifices were ordered while they remained in this place; priests consecrated; laws given about clean and unclean things; and about marriages, and feasts, and the year of jubilee, with several other things, mentioned in the book of Leviticus. Here also the people were numbered; their encampment ordered; a second Passover kept; laws given about the water of jealousy and the Nazarites, with several other matters: and then, after they had lain here eleven months and twenty days, they are commanded to leave this famous station; the most remarkable of all other, (Numb. x. 11, 12.)

Ver. 16. And they removed from the desert of Sinai, and pitched at Kibroth-hattaavah.] A place in the wilderness of Paran, three days' journey from Mount Sinai, Numb. x. 23. xi. 34. where there was a dreadful slaughter of the people, that wantonly despised manna, and lusted after flesh. Yet here God was pleased to vouchsafe to send his Spirit upon the seventy elders, for the assistance of Moses.

Ver. 17. And they departed from Kibroth-hattaavah, and encamped at Hazeroth.] See chap. xi. 35. where Miriam was punished for her envy at Moses, chap. xii. 1. 10.

Ver. 18. And they departed from Hazeroth, and pitched at Rithmah.] A place also in the wilderness of Paran, as appears from this book, (chap. xii. 16.) and was not far from Kadesh-barnea, from whence the spies were sent to search out the land of Canaan. (See chap. xiii. 26.) In which place they lay a long time, (Deut. i. 46.)

Ver. 19. And they departed from Rithmah, and pitched in Rimmon-Parez.] This and the following stages are no where else mentioned; and seem to have all been in the wilderness of Paran before spoken of; which was a very long tract of ground, from Elana, a port in the Arabian Gulf, to Kadesh-barnea; which, as David Chytræus computes it, was thirty German miles.

Ver. 20. And they departed from Rimmon-Parez, and pitched in Libnah.] This and the rest to ver. 31. are places of which, as I said, we no where else read, and so can give no account of them. They were all uninhabited, and out of the road of all travellers; and perhaps had no names till they were given them by the Israelites; who encamped in so many various places (sometimes in mountains, as appears from ver. 23. and sometimes in the plain), that they might be taught, that God was alike present every where to protect, defend, and provide for them; even there where no man dwelt. The Jews made this use of their travels, here recorded by Moses, through so many unknown places, by which he brought them at last to Canaan; to keep up their spirits under this long captivity (as they call it) wherein they now are, and have wandered uncertainly from mountain to mountain, from kingdom to kingdom, from banishment to banishment (as they themselves speak), till their Messiah come to redeem them: which he will do, when their eyes are opened to see what one of their ancient rabbins (Moses Hadarschan) hath told them, as he is quoted by Paulus Fagius, that "the Redeemer was born before him who reduced Israel into this last captivity."

Ver. 31. And they departed from Moseroth, and pitched in Bene-Jaakan.] In Deut. x. 6. Moses seems to say the quite contrary, that they took their journey from Beeroth of the children of Jaakan to Mosera. But there he may be thought to speak of a different place, as Drusius notes upon those words: or if he doth not, it is no wonder if, while they wandered in this tedious wilderness, they went backward and forward from Bene-Jaakan to Moseroth, which he mentions in Deuteronomy; and from Moseroth back again to Bene-Jaakan, which he mentions here.

Ver. 32. And they journeyed from Bene-Jaakan, and encamped at Hor-hagidgad.] This place was also called Gudgodah, Deut. x. 7. if Moses speaks there of the same places he doth here.

Ver. 33. And they went from Hor-hagidgad, and pitched in Jothathah.] Called Deut. x. 7. Jotbath.

Ver. 34. And they removed from Jotbathah, and encamped at Ebronah.] All their removals mentioned from ver. 16. to this and the next place, are an account of their wanderings in the wilderness, from the second year after their coming out of Egypt till the fortieth; in which time all the congregation, above twenty years of age, were consumed, and buried in some part or other of this great desert.

Ver. 35. And they departed from Ebronah, and encamped at Ezion-Gaber.] A place on the Red Sea, unto which they were brought before they ended their travels, (1 Kings ix. 26. xxii. 18.) It had its name from the snagged rocks, like to the backbone, which stretched out a great way on that shore, as Bochart observes: which rocks made this part so dangerous, that it was forsaken in aftertimes, and Elah frequented as a safer harbour. (See lib. i. Canaan, cap. 44.) It is not recorded how long they remained in any of these places; but it is likely a considerable time in some of them; for they spent thirty-eight years in these removals.

Ver. 36. And they removed from Ezion-Gaber, and pitched in the wilderness of Zin, which is Kadesh.] See chap. xx. 1. He doth not mean Kadesh-barnea, which was on the borders of Canaan; but another Kadesh, in the skirts of this wilderness, towards the south, not far from the port I now mentioned (which the Greeks call Elana), on the border of Edom; where Miriam died, and where water was brought out of a rock. (See chap. xx. 8. 14. 16.)

Ver. 37. And they removed from Kadesh, and pitched in Mount Hor, in the edge of the land of Edom.] See chap. xx. 28.

Ver. 38. And Aaron went up into Mount Hor, at the commandment of the Lord.] See chap. xx. 23, 24. 27. Deut. xxxii. 50. The Hebrew doctors are too conceited in their observation, that, because it is said of him, and of Moses, that they died al pi (at the mouth) of the Lord, the Lord took their souls out of their bodies with a kiss. But Maimonides endeavours to make a sober sense of this, by making their meaning to be, that they expired with the transcendent pleasure of Divine love, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 51.)

And died there, in the fortieth year after the children of Israel came out of the land of Egypt, in the first day of the fifth month.] A few months before his brother Moses.

Ver. 39. And Aaron was a hundred and twenty and three years old when he died in Mount Hor.] He was just eighty and three years old, when he and Moses first went with a message to Pharaoh, (Exod. vii. 7.) By which it appears, that they were not long in working all the miracles in Egypt, before they brought the people forth; for now, forty years after, he was but a hundred twenty-three years old.

Ver. 40. And king Arad the Canaanite, which dwelt in the south in the land of Canaan.] See chap. xxi. 1.

Heard of the coming of the children of Israel.] Had news brought him, that the Israelites were coming towards his country; whereupon he went out to oppose them; and God gave them (as we read there) a glorious victory over him. This shews that Moses intended, in the recital of all these places where they had been, to bring to remembrance the most remarkable passages of God's providence over them; some of which he expressly sets down.

Ver. 41. And they departed from Mount Hor, and pitched in Zalmonah.] We read in the twenty-first chapter of this book, ver. 4. that they journeyed from Hor to compass the land of Edom, but are not told there where they pitched; which is here supplied, the name of the place being Zalmonah; which carries in it the signification of an image; and therefore here, perhaps, the brazen serpent was erected. (See chap. xxi. 9.)

Ver. 42. And they departed from Zalmonah, and pitched in Punon.] Where Bochartus rather thinks the brazen serpent was set up; because after Moses hath given us the history of that, he saith, they set forward and pitched in Oboth, (chap. xxi. 10.) which was the place of their abode next to Punon, as it here follows, Hierozoic. par. i. lib. iii. cap. 12. in the latter end of it.

Ver. 43. And they departed from Punon, and pitched in Oboth.] See chap. xxi. 10.

Ver. 44. And they departed from Oboth, and pitched in Jie-abarim, in the border of Moab.] See chap. xxi. 11. This name is translated in the margin, heaps of Abarim; which may possibly signify many heaps of stones, which lay not far from the mountains of Abarim, (ver. 47.)

Ver. 45. And they departed from Jim, and pitched in Dibon-gad.] Here half the name of the first place is omitted; as is usual when the names are long. This may seem not to agree with chap. xxi. 12. where it is said they removed from thence, and pitched in the valley of Zered; near unto which, in all probability, was this Dibon-gad. See what I have noted there.

Ver. 46. And they removed from Dibon-gad, and encamped in Almon-Diblathaim.] See chap. xxi. 13.

Ver. 47. And they removed from Almon-Diblathaim, and pitched in the mountains of Abarim before Nebo.] We read no where when they came to this mansion: but it is plain they were not far from it, when God bade Moses go into one of these mountains, and take a view of Canaan. (See chap. xxvii. 12.) But this followed their last mansion; and therefore it is most likely this is the place mentioned chap. xxi. 20. See there; where I have observed other places mentioned, ver. 18, 19. of which there is no notice taken in this catalogue. But they seem to have been places where they only touched, and made no encampment in them; which is the thing of which Moses here gives an account.

Ver. 48. And they departed from the mountains of Abarim, and pitched in the plains of Moab, &c.] See chap. xxii. 1.

Ver. 49. And they pitched by Jordan, from Beth-Jeshimoth.] A place where there was a temple, in all likelihood, to some deity: for so Beth denotes in many compositions; as Beth-Peor (the house or temple of Baal on the top of Peor), Beth-Astaroth, and Beth-Baal-berith, (Judg. ix. 4.) and Beth-Shemesh is often mentioned; where the sun was worshipped. And possibly Jeshimoth may be the same with Jeshimon, (chap. xxi. 20.)

Even unto Abel-Shittim, &c.] Called simply Shittim, chap. xxv. 1. which some fancy had the name of Abel added to it (which signifies mourning), because of that lamentation which was made there, by some, for the grievous sin there committed; and by others, for the heavy punishment inflicted in that place. But it seems to have been anciently called Abel-Shittim, before this time. (See there.)

Ver. 50. And the Lord spake unto Moses in the plains of Moab, &c.] After he had prepared them for their entrance into Canaan, he ordered the first and principal work they should there undertake.

Ver. 51. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye are passed over Jordan into the land of Canaan.] Accordingly Moses did deliver this command unto them, (Deut. vii, 1, 2.)

Ver. 52. Then ye shall drive out all the inhabitants of the land from before you.] Not suffer them to dwell in the land any longer; but either destroy, or expel them; because they were abominable idolaters, devoted to extermination, (Exod. xxiii. 33. Deut. xx. 16—18.) by whom the Israelites would have been in danger to be corrupted, if they were not rooted out.

And destroy all their pictures.] Or their temples, or houses of worship, as Onkelos interprets it. But others (particularly the Jerusalem Targum), understand it of the idols or statues set up in those temples; or some representations of their gods. (See concerning the Hebrew word maskith, Lev. xxv. 1.)

And destroy their molten images.] Exod. xxiii. 24. xxxiv. 13. for if they suffered them to remain, they might be enticed to worship them. These were idols, perhaps, in public places, or private houses, out of their temples.

And quite pluck down all their high places.] They could not throw down the mountains, upon which the people of Canaan worshipped; but the meaning is, that they should cut down the groves which were there planted, and demolish all the altars that stood in them. For there were no other temples, at first, but these groves upon mountains; where the ancient heathen worshipped the sun, moon, and stars: unto which they thought the mountains approached nearer than the rest of the earth; and therefore their sacrifices there would be most prevalent. But of this I have said enough elsewhere.

Ver. 53. And ye shall dispossess the inhabitants of the land, and dwell therein: for I have given you the land to possess it.] Yet he did not intend they should dispossess the old inhabitants all at once, but by degrees; as he himself saith in Exod. xxiii. 29, 30. Deut. vii. 22.

Ver. 54. And ye shall divide the land by lot for an inheritance among your families.] Follow the directions I have already given for the dividing of the land, after the old inhabitants are expelled, (chap. xxvi. 53. 55.)

And to the more ye shall give the more inheritance, and to the fewer the less, &c.] See chap. xxvi. 54. 56.

Ver. 55. And if ye will not drive out the inhabitants of the land from before you.] At the first they could not drive them all out; nor was it God's design, as I before observed. Therefore Joshua would not attempt it while he lived; but left several nations, or part of them, unsubdued, (Judg. ii. 21. 23.) Of which he himself takes notice a little before he died, Josh. xxiii. 4. 7. where he warns them to have nothing to do with them; promising them that God would in time expel them quite, (ver. 5.) But when the Israelites grew slothful and cowardly, and negligently suffered the people of Canaan to dwell among them, and made friendship with them (as they did after Joshua and all that generation were dead), then followed what is here threatened in the next words.

Then it shall come to pass, that those which ye let remain of them.] Voluntarily permit to live among you, without endeavouring to dispossess them.

Shall be pricks in your eyes, and thorns in your sides.] Bring very sore calamities upon you; as grievous and as mischievous as a wound made in the eye, which is a most tender part; or in the side, when a thorn sticks and festers in it. Some are so curious, as, by the first part of these words (pricks in your eyes), to understand their being stimulated to idolatry, by beholding their rites of religion and manner of worship: and the next they take to signify the effect of it in sharp punishments, which should befal them for their forsaking God. Joshua threatened the same before he died, chap. xxiii. 13. Of which an angel, or messenger of the Lord, minded them, Judg. ii. 3. And so it came to pass, as we read there, ver. 14. and throughout that whole book.

And shall vex you in the land wherein ye dwell.] Make you very uneasy, nay, sigh and groan, in the good land which God gives you, by reason of their oppression, (Judg. ii. 18. iv. 3. vi. 6, &c.)

Ver. 56. Moreover, I will do unto you as I thought to do unto them.] As I purposed to do unto them; i. e. make you their slaves; as they were to several people whom they served many years, Judg. iii. 8. 14. vi. 2. and many other places. Or make you flee before them; and at last expel you from the land I give you.

CHAP. XXXIV.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] In the same place, where they were when he last spake to him; for they made no other removals till they marched for Canaan.

Ver. 2. Command the children of Israel.] Charge them to take notice of this.

And say unto them, When ye come into the land of Canaan, this is the land that shall fall unto you for your inheritance.] Having spoken to them concerning their dispossessing the Canaanites, and dividing their land among their tribes; it was fit to describe the bounds of their country, that they might know whom they were to destroy, and into whose possessions they were to enter.

Even the land of Canaan, and the coasts thereof.] The land beyond Jordan; and the limits or bounds thereof.

Ver. 3. Then your south quarter shall be from the wilderness of Zin.] Mentioned in the foregoing chapter, ver. 36.

Along by the coast of Edom.] Which bordered upon this wilderness, (chap. xx. 1. 14.)

And your south border shall be the utmost coast of the Salt Sea.] From the very tongue of it, as it is expressed Josh. xv. 2. where it appears this was the portion of the tribe of Judah. The Salt Sea is that which is called sometimes the Dead Sea, and in other authors, Lacus Asphaltites: (see Gen. xiv. 3.) The Hebrews call all great lakes by the name of seas; and this is called the Salt Sea, because the water of it is very salt, or, as some express it, bitter; and the Dead Sea, propter aquæ immobilitatem, as Justin speaks, lib. xxxvi. because of the immoveableness of the water, which is never stirred by the greatest winds. (See Vossius de Orig. et Progr. Idolol. lib. ii. cap. 68.)

Eastward.] Where the eastern and southern borders meet.

Ver. 4. And your border.] That is, this south border.

Shall turn.] Not go on in a straight line; but bending towards the west.

From the south to the ascent of Akrabbim.] Or, to Maale-Akrabbim, a mountain on the south end of the Dead Sea, (Josh. xv. 3. Judg. i. 36.) so called, as Bochartus conjectures, from the vast multitude of scorpions found here: from which mountain also, it is probable, the region called Acrabatena, near to Idumæa, had its name, (1 Maccab. v. 3.) See Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 29.

And pass on to Zin.] Either to a place called Zin, or part of the wilderness of Zin; which lay on the south of the land of Canaan, (chap. xiii. 21.)

And the going forth thereof shall be from the south.] That is, still on towards the south; as appears from what goes before, and follows after.

To Kadesh-barnea.] From whence the spies were sent to search out the land; and are said expressly to have gone up by the south, chap. xiii. 22. 26.

And shall go on to Hazar-Addar.] Or, to the village of Addar, as the Vulgar Latin renders it; which seems to be justified by Josh. xv. 3. where it is simply called Addar. There is indeed a place called Hezron joined with it, which may be thought to be the same with Hazar: but so is another place also called Karkaa; both which may as well be thought to be here omitted, for brevity's sake.

And pass on to Azmon.] A place lying on the west end of the mount of Edom.

Ver. 5. And the border shall fetch a compass.] There shall be a greater turn than that mentioned ver. 4. bending still more westward.

From Azmon unto the river of Egypt.] By the river of Egypt is properly understood Nile; and so Jonathan here renders the Hebrew word Nahal (river) by Nilus: which may seem to have taken its name from the word Nahal; which the ancients did not pronounce as we now do, but called it Neel, as we find in Epiphanius; from whence Nilus was very easily made, as Bochartus observes, Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. v. cap. 15. But if Nile be here meant, it must be the more northerly mouth of it, where Pelusium stood. (See Gen. xv. 18.)

And the goings out of it shall be at the sea.] This border ended at the sea, called the Great Sea in the next verse.

Ver. 6. And as for the western border, ye shall have even the Great Sea.] That is, the Mediterranean, or Midland Sea, which lay on the west of Judea; and is called by the Hebrews the Great Sea, in comparison with the Lake of Genesaret and Asphaltites, which they also called seas.

For your border.] On the west, as it here follows.

This shall be your western border.] From the river of Egypt as far as Zidon, which was a part of the promised land, as appears from Josh. xiii. 6. Judg. i. 31. All the cities, indeed, on the shore of this sea were held by the Philistines and others, till the time of David; but the Israelites had a right to them. And the famous Rabbi Juda understands these words, as if they should have the western ocean itself for their portion, as well as the land adjacent to it: for so he expounds these words, as if Moses had said, This shall be your western border; viz. the border of the sea, and the isles near unto it. And the Jerusalem Targum more plainly, "And let the Great Sea be your border; i. e. the ocean, and the isles thereof, and the cities, and the ships with the ancient waters, that are in the midst of it." See Selden, in his Mare Clausum, lib. i. cap. 6. where he alleges this as a proof, that men anciently thought they might have a dominion over the sea, as well as the land.

Ver. 7. And this shall be your northern border from the Great Sea.] From the Mediterranean, which lay on the west.

Ye shall point out for you.] Mark out for your direction.

Mount Hor.] Not that mount where Aaron died; for that was on the south of the land of Canaan, towards Edom; but this was diametrically opposite, on the north of it; and therefore must, in all likelihood, be some part of Mount Libanus, which, with Antilibanus (more towards the Great Sea), bounded the promised land on the north. But there were several parts of Mount Libanus which were called by several names; and probably one of them was called Hor, because of its eminency or height above the rest. So the Vulgar translates it; reading, I suppose, the Hebrew, not Hor hahar, i. e. Hor the mountain, but Har hahar, the mountain of mountain, i. e. the highest mountain. The Jews generally by this Mount Hor understand Amanus, which is a part of Taurus (as Mr. Selden observes in the place beforenamed), which the Jerusalem Targum calls more briefly Manus.

Ver. 8. From Mount Hor ye shall point out your border to the entrance of Hamath.] There were two Hamaths; one called by the Grecks Antiochia, the other Epiphania. The former called Hamath the Great, Amos vi. 2. to distinguish it from the latter, which is the city that is always meant, when we read the bounds of Judea were to the entrance of Hamath northward; as here and chap. xiii. 21. For it is certain, as Bochartus observes, they did not reach to Antiochia, but came near to Epiphania, (lib. iv. Phaleg. cap. 36.) And this makes it probable, that Hor, as I said before, may be a promontory of Libanus; because in Josh. xiii. 5. Hermon is joined with the entrance of Hamath, as Hor is here. Now Hermon was certainly a part of Libanus: by some called Sirion; by others Senir, (Deut. iii. 9.) and by others Sion, (Deut. iv. 48.)

And the going forth of the border shall be to Zedad.] Which in Ezekiel's time was reckoned the northern border (together with Hamath) from the Great Sea; just as it is here. (Ezek. xlvii. 15, 16.)

Ver. 9. And the border shall go on to Ziphron.] Another town in those parts; of which I find no mention any where else.

And the goings out of it shall be at Hazar-Enan.] Here it ended; which was a place that retained its name till Ezekiel's time, (chap. xlvii. 17.) David Chytræus seems to have given a full account of this northern border in a few words. It extended, saith he, from the Mediterranean, by the mountains of Libanus, to the fountain of Jordan; in which tract are the towns of Hamath, Zedad (in the tribe of Naphtali), Ziphron (in the same tribe at the foot of Libanus), and Hazar-Enan, which he takes to signify a village at the fountain, viz. of Jordan.

Ver. 10. And ye shall point out your east border from Hazar-Enan.] From the fountain of Jordan, as was said before.

To Shepham.] A place not far from thence; for the river Jordan was certainly the eastern limits.

Ver. 11. And the coast.] The limits, or bounds.

Shall go down from Shepham to Riblah.] A place, no doubt, near to Jordan; with which river the eastern limits go along. St. Jerome takes Riblah to be Antiochia; but that was in Syria, to which the promised land did not reach.

On the east side of Ain.] The Vulgar reads it, the fountain of Daphne. And, indeed, Ain signifies a fountain; and both Jonathan and the Jerusalem Targum take Riblah for Daphne; as they do Shepham beforementioned for Apamia. But this is only a vain conceit of the Jews, who would extend their bounds beyond what God gave them. For it is certain the land of Canaan never extended to these places, as Bochartus observes, lib. i. Canaan, cap. 16. And therefore Daphne (which was in the suburbs of Antiochia) cannot be here meant, unless we understand another place, mentioned by Josephus, (lib. iv. de Bello Judaico, cap. 1.) which lay near the lake of Semechonites, through the middle of which Jordan ran. And then Ain must signify another fountain of Jordan, for it had more than one. And thus David Chytræus explains this part of the verse, and the foregoing: The eastern bounds were the river Jordan, near to which were these places; Enan, which had its name from the fountain of the river; and Shepham, not far from thence; Riblah, which was also near to Jordan, lying between the lake of Semechonites and Genesaret.

And the border shall descend, and shall reach unto the side of the sea of Cinnereth eastward.] To the east side of this sea or lake, which had its name from a city so called, Josh. xix. 35. and a country, 1 Kings xv. 20. or else it gave them their names: for David Chytræus will have it called Cinnereth, from the Hebrew word cinnor, which signifies a harp, or lute, the lake being of that shape and figure, about four German miles long, and two and a half broad. It is called the sea of Galilee, or Tiberias, in the gospel.

Ver. 12. And the border.] i. e. This eastern border.

Shall go down to Jordan.] That is, to the river which was eminently so called, (and was on the east part of Canaan, Gen. xiii. 11.) for it was very small till it came to the lake of Genesaret beforementioned. From whence, being augmented by several torrents and rivulets, it ran in a wider stream, till it fell into the Salt or Dead Sea. (See Bonfrerius out of Josephus, lib. iv. de Bello Judaico, cap. 1.)

And its goings out shall be at the Salt Sea.] There was the end of this border; where it met with the southern, as was observed above, (ver. 3.)

This shall be your land, with the coasts thereof, round about.] As was said before, (ver. 2.) therefore they were not to extend their right any further; this being the country he promised Abraham, when he bade him lift up his eyes, and look from the place where he was, "northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward, and walk through the length of the land, and breadth of it," which he assures to his posterity, Gen. xiii. 14—17. which now he lays out for them, with the exact limits of it, in all those four quarters.

Ver. 13. And Moses commanded the children of Israel, saying, This is the land which ye shall inherit by lot.] He repeats it so often, that they might know what people they were to dispossess, and with whom they might make friendship; and not to extend their desires beyond the bounds of God's gracious grant to them. By which they were placed in a very fertile and pleasant country, bounded, as appears by the foregoing description, on the south, (ver. 4, 5.) by great mountains, which sheltered them from the burning air of the deserts of Arabia; on the west, by the Midland Sea, which sent to them refreshing breezes; and on the north, by Mount Libanus, which kept off the colder blasts from that quarter; and on the east, the delightful plains of Jordan, abounding with palm-trees, especially about Jericho, which yielded them a great revenue.

Which the Lord commanded to give to the nine tribes, and to the half tribe.] This he had not said plainly before, though it was necessarily inferred, from his granting to two tribes and a half their inheritance beyond Jordan.

Ver. 14. For the tribe of the children of Reuben, according to the house of their fathers, and the tribe of the children of Gad, &c. have received their inheritance.] Upon condition they performed their promise, to help the rest of their tribes to win their inheritance in Canaan. So those words are to be understood, I observed xxxii. 33. "Moses gave unto them the kingdom of Sihon," &c.

Ver. 15. The two tribes and a half have received their inheritance on this side Jordan, &c.] By the gift of God, as they themselves understood it, xxxii. 31. The bounds of which the Jerusalem Targum here undertakes to set down, and makes them extend eastward as far as the great river Euphrates; having respect, I suppose, to Gen. xv. 18. and Exod. xxiii. 30. where he sets down the utmost bounds of the countries he intended to bestow upon them in future times (see there), but here only describes the limits of that land, which they were to enjoy in present possession; and was all that God granted to Abraham, when he brought him out of Chaldea, and made his first promise unto him, (Gen. xii. 1. 7. xiii. 14, 15. 17. xv. 7.)

Ver. 16. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] Having told them what they should divide, it was proper to appoint some persons to take care to see the division made.

Ver. 17. These are the names of the men which shall divide the land.] Though the land was to be divided by lot, yet it was fit there should be some persons to oversee the business, and take care there should be no fraud in the drawing of them: and when they were drawn, to prevent all quarrels, by determining what portion those who had too much should give to those who had too little, (xxvi. 54, 55.)

Eleazar the priest, and Joshua the son of Nun.] These were the principal persons concerned in this great affair; who were so conscientious therein, that they did it in the presence of God, at the door of the tabernacle, (Josh. xviii. 6. 8. 10. xix. 51.)

Ver. 18. And ye shall take one prince of every tribe, to divide the land by inheritance.] They are called in the place last named, the heads of the fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel.

Ver. 19. The names of the men are these: Of the tribe of Judah, Caleb the son of Jephunneh.] I have nothing to observe upon this and the following verses, to the end of the chapter, but that the tribes are not mentioned in such order as they were at their first numbering, (i. 5, 6, &c.) or at their second, (xxvi. 5, &c.) yet great exactness and a particular direction of God may be noted in their placing here; for they are set down according to their situation which they had afterward in the land of Canaan; as if Moses foresaw who should be next neighbours one to another. For Judah having his inheritance given him first, (Josh. xv.) Simeon, who is here next mentioned, was so near him in the land of Canaan, that he had a portion given him out of the lot of Judah, which proved too large for that tribe, (Josh. xix. 9. Judg. i. 3. 17.) Then Benjamin, who here follows, in the third place, was so near to Judah, that they never separated when the ten tribes were rent from them. Dan was not far from Judah; and the children of Joseph also were their neighbours. And the rest of the tribes, Zebulun, Issachar, Asher, Naphtali, are set down here just in the order wherein their lots fell to them in Canaan, (Josh. xix. 10. 17. 24. 32.) An evidence that Moses was guided by a Divine Spirit in all his writings.

CHAP. XXXV.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Moses, in the plains of Moab, by Jordan, near Jericho, saying.] Sec xxii. 1. Hitherto nothing had been said of the Levites; but that they should have no lot in the land of Canaan. But now God provides that they should have habitations assigned them to dwell in, though they had no fields, nor olive-yards, &c. as the rest of their brethren had. They might, indeed, have been able to purchase houses for themselves out of the tithes, and other things, which God had long ago bestowed upon them for their portion: but it was not fit that God's ministers should be left without any certain dwelling. And besides, God would have them live comfortably, and not only have houses, but a little ground about them, for their more commodious subsistence.

Ver. 2. Command the children of Israel, that they give unto the Levites of the inheritance of their possession.] Out of their share that shall fall to them in the land of Canaan, and on this side Jordan.

Cities to dwell in.] That they might not be in danger to wander up and down to seek a habitation.

And ye shall give also to the Levites suburbs for the cities round about them.] Some ground lying round about their cities, the reason of which is given in the next verse.

Ver. 3. And the cities they shall have to dwell in.] That they may build houses for themselves to dwell in. Which did not make it unlawful for them to hire or purchase houses in any other city, particularly at Jerusalem, or the place where the tabernacle was settled; for we find in Scripture many proofs of their dwelling in other cities, beside these which are here assigned to them. And, in like manner, other people, with their permission, might dwell with them in these cities, without any breach of this law.

And the suburbs shall be for their cattle.] To afford pasture for their oxen and sheep.

And for their goods.] The Hebrew word signifies, not only all kind of household stuff, but whatsoever was necessary for them and their cattle without doors.

And for their beasts.] Horses, asses, mules, and all sorts of living creatures, as the Hebrew word signifies. But it was not lawful for them to build houses in these fields, nor plant vineyards, nor sow corn: but they were given them only to make their dwellings more sweet; and that they might have the convenience of cattle about them, for provisions, and all other uses.

Ver. 4. And the suburbs and cities which ye shall give unto the Levites.] To be their possession, by as good and full a right, as their brethren of the other tribes had in their lands, which fell to them for their inheritance by lot: see Lev. xxv. 31—33. where they themselves are disabled to alienate either the houses or fields of their cities. But if they sold a house, it was to revert at the jubilee; and the fields they could not so much as sell till that time.

Shall reach from the wall of the city and outward a thousand cubits round about.] This space was for their outhouses; as stables, places for hay and straw, and such-like things, and perhaps for gardens of herbs and flowers. The Gemara, upon the ninth chapter of Sota, sect. 9. saith, that, under the second temple, the Levites had no suburbs; which were not restored to them after the captivity of Babylon. But there being great care taken that the people shall pay all the tithe of their ground unto the Levites, (Nehem. x. 37.) it is unreasonable to think that care was not taken for places to lay them in.

Ver. 5. And ye shall measure from without the city.] It is not said, as in the foregoing verse, from the wall of the city; therefore I take it to signify from the outside of the suburbs beforementioned.

On the east side two thousand cubits, and on the south side two thousand cubits, &c.] So there was in the whole three thousand cubits round about the city: a thousand for the suburbs, properly so called; and two thousand more for their pasture, called properly the fields of the suburbs, Lev. xxv. 34. This is the most natural and easy explication of this place.

And the city shall be in the midst.] So that there was exactly, every way, such a circuit of ground about it.

This shall be the suburbs of the cities.] Here the word suburbs comprehends the fields also. And Maimonides saith, that, by the constitution of the elders, they set forth also a burying-place for every city beyond these limits: for they might not bury their dead within the suburbs or fields; which they ground upon the foregoing verse, which appoints them for other uses, (Schemita ve Jobel, cap. 13.)

Ver. 6. And among the cities which ye shall give unto the Levites, there shall be six cities for refuge.] Three in the land of Canaan, and three on the other side Jordan, (ver. 14.) the names of which are set down, Josh. xx. 7, 8. and those on the other side Jordan were set apart by Moses himself before he died, (Deut. iv. 43.) The reason of their being called cities of refuge, is given in the next words.

Which ye shall appoint for the manslayer.] Such a manslayer as is afterward described; who killed another against his will.

That he may flee thither.] And there be preserved, and kept in safety, if he was not found guilty of wilful murder. The cities of the Levites were appointed for this purpose, rather than any other, because they were a kind of sacred places, inhabited by sacred persons. And here men might spend their time better than in other cities, being among God's ministers; who might make them sensible of the negligence which men were commonly guilty of in such cases, and of such sins as they might have otherwise committed.

And to them ye shall add forty-two cities.] Which had all the same privilege, if we may believe the Hebrew doctors; but not equally with the six. For in the six a manslayer was to have a house to dwell in for nothing; but in the other forty-two, he was to pay for it. And the Levites could not refuse him entrance into the six; but as for the rest, it was in their choice whether they would receive him or not. Thus Maimonides, out of their ancient authors. See Selden, lib. iv. de Jure Nat. et Gent. juxta Discipl. Hebr. cap. 2. where he observes, that the altar also was a place of refuge, according to Exod. xxi. 14. but with many exceptions; both with relation to the parts of the altar, and to the persons who fled thither, and to the quality of the offence, and their stay there; which very much lessened the privilege of this refuge.

Ver. 7. So all the cities which ye shall give to the Levites shall be forty-eight cities, &c.] Accordingly we read Joshua gave them so many, Josh. xxi. 41. Thirteen of which the priests had; and the rest the Levites. And in the days of the Messiah (whom they vainly still expect), other cities shall be added to them (saith Maimonides), which shall belong to the Levites.

Ver. 8. And the cities which ye shall give them shall be of the possession of the children of Israel.] And so it is said, Josh. xxi. 3. that "the children of Israel gave unto the Levites, out of their inheritance, these cities and their suburbs." Where we read also, they were given them by lot, as the children of Israel had their inheritance given them.

From them which have many ye shall give many, and from them that have few ye shall give few.] According to the rule in distributing their inheritances to the Israelites, xxxiii. 54.

Every one shall give of his cities unto the Levites according to the inheritance which he shall inherit.] Thus they gave nine cities out of the two tribes of Judah and Simeon, (Josh. xxi. 16.) and but four out of Benjamin, which was a small tribe, (ver. 18.) out of the tribes of Issachar and Asher, four a-piece, (ver. 28. 31.) and out of Naphtali, no more than three, (ver. 32.)

Ver. 9. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying.] This being a matter of great importance, that guiltless men should not suffer, nor the guilty escape punishment, the Lord gives Moses further direction about it, as he promised he would in Exod. xxi. 13.

Ver. 10. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them.] Repeat this command to them; which God himself repeated to Joshua, xx. 1. 2.

When ye be come over Jordan into the land of Canaan.] When they had possession of it, and divided it, and were settled in it: so it is explained Deut. xix. 1, 2.

Ver. 11. Then shall ye appoint you cities to be cities of refuge for you.] This seems to signify, that all the cities of the Levites were in some sort a protection to the manslayer, as I said upon ver. 6. Such places the temples were among the Athenians, as Sam. Petitus observes in Leges Atticas, p. 12, 13. yet not all of them; for he can find only six; that of Mercy, and that of Eumenides and Minerva, and those dedicated to Theseus (one of them within the city, the other without the walls), and that in Munychia.

That the manslayer may flee thither, which killeth any person at unawares.] Or, as it is Josh. xx. 3. unwittingly, Deut. xix. 4. ignorantly; that is, besides his intention, having no such design, nor hatred to him, as is there expressly said, and here below, (ver. 22.) This is repeated ver. 15. And the instances of it are such as these, mentioned by Georg. Ritterhusius de Jure Asylorum, cap. 4. If a man cutting wood, the hatchet flying from the helve, should hit a man, and kill him; or a huntsman shooting at a deer in a thicket, should kill a man, whom he did not see lying there: an example of which we have in Adrastus, mentioned by Herodotus, lib. i.

Ver. 12. And they shall be unto you cities for refuge from the avenger.] From him who had a right to call a murderer to account for the blood he had shed, and is therefore called the avenger of blood, ver. 19. who, being stimulated with anger and grief for the death of a near relation, might, in a heat of rage, hastily kill him who was not guilty of murder. And therefore this provision is made for the preservation of an innocent person against the violent prosecution of the avenger. In the Hebrew, the word for avenger is goel, which signifying a redeemer, plainly denotes that the next of kin to him that was slain is here meant. For to that person belonged the right of redemption of estates, (Lev. xxv. 25.) and of marrying the wife of a kinsman deceased without issue, (Ruth iii. 12, 13.) And consequently such a person, that is the nearest of kin, is here intended to be the revenger of blood: and therefore no man might undertake this office, but he alone who was the next heir to him that was slain; as Mr. Selden observes, lib. iv. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 1. p. 469. Grotius observes the like custom among the ancient Greeks, of private men taking revenge for the death of their relations or friends, (lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 20. sect. 8. n. 6.)

That the manslayer die not.] By a sudden heat of passion. This was a merciful provision (as Maimonides observes), both for the manslayer, that he might be preserved, and for the avenger, that his blood might be cooled, by the removal of the manslayer out of his sight, by his flight to another place, (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 40.)

Until he stand before the congregation.] The city of refuge protected him that fled thither, "Salvo tamen juris et justitiæ examine" (as the lawyers speak), yet so that the matter should be brought to a fair trial before proper judges. They of the city of refuge examined him before his admittance into the place, (Josh. xx. 4.) But they were not judges, nor could they examine witnesses. And therefore he was delivered, upon demand, to the senate, or court of judgment, of that city where the fact was committed, that they might try whether he were guilty or not of wilful murder. So the Hebrews understand the word edah, congregation, in this place (as in many others), to signify the Sanhedrin of Twenty-three, as Mr. Selden observes, (lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 5. n. 2. and lib. iii. cap. 8. n. 3.) And as by congregation is meant the court where causes were tried, so it is reasonable to interpret it of that court which sat in the city where the fact was committed, and not that in the city of refuge, because there the witnesses were; and it is expressly said, ver. 25. that if the congregation found him to be innocent, he should be restored to the city of refuge. Which evidently supposes he was not judged there, but in another place; and none so proper as that before mentioned.

Ver. 13. And of these cities which ye shall give, six cities ye shall have for refuge.] They might flee unto any other cities of the Levites; but in these six they were most certain to find protection. (See ver. 6.) And the best provision was made for the manslayer's easy and safe flying thither: for the ways that led thither were to be made very plain and broad (thirty-two cubits wide), and to be kept in good repair; for which they alleged (in the title Maccoth, cap. 2. sect. 5.) those words Deut. xix. 3. "Thou shalt prepare the way," &c. And two students in the law were to accompany him; that if the avenger of blood should overtake him, before he got into the city, they might endeavour to pacify him by wise persuasions; and that he might not miss his way to the place whither he intended to flee, there were posts erected, where two or three ways met, with this inscription, MIKLAT, i. e. the city of refuge, to direct him into that road which led to it. A certain day also was appointed, which was the fifteenth of February, for the repairing of the highways, and of the bridges, which might have been broken by the winter rains or floods.

Ver. 14. And ye shall give three cities on this side Jordan, and three cities in the land of Canaan.] This seems not to be an equal partition; the land of Canaan being far bigger than the territory beyond Jordan; for it contained above three parts of four of the tribes of Israel. But it is to be considered, that the country beyond Jordan was as long as the land of Canaan, though not so broad: and they also beyond Jordan might flee to any of the cities in Canaan, if they were nearer to them. And besides, God commanded those in Canaan, if he enlarged their coast, to add three cities more, besides these, (Deut. xix. 8, 9.)

Why six cities are appointed for this purpose, and no more; and why three on one side of Jordan, and three on the other, Philo alleges some mystical reasons; but so far-fetched, that I do not think fit to mention them.

Ver. 15. These six cities shall be a refuge.] They all began to be so at the same time, according to the Talmudists. For till those three in Canaan were set out, these three on the other side Jordan (though set out by Moses before they went into Canaan, Deut. iv. 43.) did not receive any manslayer. Which they prove in the forenamed title, Maccoth, cap. 2. sect. 4. from these very words, these six shall be cities of refuge; that is, when the other three were appointed, then they all received those that fled to them.

Both for the children of Israel, and for the stranger, and for the sojourner among them.] Both strangers and sojourners had renounced idolatry, but had not equally embraced the Jewish religion; yet both of them had the same share in this benefit, with the native Israelites; it being a natural right, that every man who was innocent should be protected. The difference between a stranger and a sojourner hath been often observed, particularly upon Lev. xix. 33, 34. Numb. xv. 15, 16.

That every one that killeth any person unawares may flee thither.] That is, every one beforementioned, whether Israelites, strangers, or sojourners. But as for such as were mere gentiles, and not so much as proselytes of the gate, if they killed another, though a gentile, they had not the benefit of this law; because they were not suffered to dwell among them, though they trafficked in the country. And if a proselyte of the gate killed an Israelite, or one that was circumcised, he also, if we may believe the Jewish doctors, was denied protection in these cities. But if he killed one like himself (i. e. a proselyte of the gate), then he had the same privilege with the Israelites, as they explain it. (See Selden, lib. iv. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 2. p. 477.)

Ver. 16. And if he smite him.] Or rather, but if he smite him.

With an instrument of iron, so that he die, he is a murderer.] For it was to be presumed, that he who run at a man with a sword, or any such weapon, intended to do him a mischief; though perhaps he had no malice to him beforehand, but did it in a passion.

So that he die.] He never going abroad after he was wounded, (Exod. xxi. 19, 20.)

The murderer shall surely be put to death.] Be taken away by the judges, though he were in a city of refuge; and, the fact being proved, condemned to die for it.

Ver. 17. And if he smite him with throwing a stone.] In the Hebrew it is, with a stone of the hand. That is, say the Jews, with a great stone that fills the hand; not with a small stone, with which he could not be presumed to intend to kill him; though he chanced to do it, by hitting him in the eye, or some other very tender part.

Wherewith he may die.] With a stone big enough to kill him.

And he die.] So that it appears he died of that blow.

He is a murderer; the murderer shall surely be put to death.] He is as guilty as the forenamed person, who smote with an instrument of iron; and his fleeing to the city of refuge shall not protect him from death.

Ver. 18. If he smite him with a hand-weapon of wood.] Such as a batoon (as we now speak), or a club, or any such kind of instrument, as is likely to kill him.

Wherewith he may die, &c.] It made no difference with what kind of weapon or instrument he was killed, whether it were of iron, wood, or stone; if he were killed wittingly and knowingly, it was murder; and the guilty person was to suffer for it. Aul. Gellius hath collected the names of the several weapons, which were mentioned in ancient history; of which there are near thirty, (lib. x. Noct. Attic. cap. 25.) one of which, called ligula, he is pleased to explain, being then not common; and saith, it was a little sword, in the form of a tongue, like our poniard, I suppose, or dagger, or long knife; which was a dangerous weapon; because men might hide it under their clothes, and kill others while they were in familiar discourse with them.

Ver. 19. The avenger of blood himself.] See ver. 12.

Shall slay the murderer.] This is thought by many to be a mere permission, not a precept; but the Jews think otherwise: that the next kin (i. e. the heir of him that was slain) stood bound to do his endeavour to avenge his blood. If he would not (saith Maimonides), or if he was not able; or if no such avenger was to be found (i. e. the murderer himself was the next heir, or the man slain was a proselyte of justice without issue), he was to be prosecuted, and put to death, by the court of judgment, and that by the sword. (See Selden, lib. iv. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 1.)

When he meeteth him he shall slay him.] He was not bound to stay for the sentence of the court, but might kill him wheresoever he found him. (See ver. 31.)

Ver. 20. But if he thrust him of hatred, &c.] Or rather, for if he thrust him, &c. that is, if by any other means, besides those mentioned ver. 16—18. he killed a man wittingly, either by pushing him down violently from a high or steep place; or throwing him into the water; or hurling a stone at him; or letting any thing fall down upon his head, though never so slily; if death followed, and it appeared he bore a hatred to him, he was to suffer death, as in the former cases. (See Deut. xix. 11.) Now this was a sufficient proof of hatred to him; if being a neighbour, and they having some difference, he had not spoken to him for three whole days together.

Ver. 21. Or in enmity smite him with his hand that he die, he that smote him shall surely be put to death.] If he gave him only a blow with his fist, of which he died, and it was proved he had enmity to him, it was sufficient to make him a murderer; and it warranted the avenger of blood to kill him, or obliged him to prosecute him, so that the city of refuge should not save him.

The revenger of blood shall slay the murderer when he meeteth him.] The civil law declared him to be unworthy to enjoy the inheritance of one that was murdered, if he neglected to prosecute the person that killed him in some court of justice. But the Jewish law allowed, or rather required, a great deal more; that the next of kin should kill the murderer with his own hands, if he met him. And thus the Abyssines, at this day (as Ritterhusius observes out of Alvarez), deliver the murderer into the hand of the next kinsman, to torture him. The reason of which law, among the Jews, was, (as the same Ritterhusius observes, de Jure Asylorum, cap. 4.) because they being all descended from one and the same stock, and equally taking of the same right, they were all concerned in the shedding of the blood of any one of them, especially they who were nearest to him in blood, who seemed to be all struck at and injured in him. So that the law, with great reason, allowed them to avenge the blood of him that was slain. With which these verses of Ovid, he thinks, agree:

"Cum tibi sint fratres, fratres ulciscere læsos.
Cumque pater tibi sit, jura tuere patris."

Ver. 22. But if he thrust him suddenly without enmity.] Killed him (after the manner forementioned, ver. 20.) in a violent passion, having no such intention, and being perhaps highly provoked by him, or by chance, as we speak, and unawares, it being proved that there was no enmity between them, no signs of hatred before this fact.

Or cast upon him any thing, without laying in wait.] Happen to hit him with any thing, without design to hurt him: (see Exod. xxi. 13. Deut. xix. 5.)

Ver. 23. Or with any stone wherewith he may die.] See ver. 17.

Seeing him not, and casting it upon him, that he die.] Throwing it at something else, or playing with it; and having no thought of him, because he did not see him.

And was not his enemy, neither sought his harm.] Not having any quarrel with him, not threatening, or any other way discovering that he sought to do him mischief.

Ver. 24. Then the congregation.] That is, the judgment to whom the trial of such causes belonged: see ver. 12. where I observed, that the elders of the city of refuge judged whether the manslayer, who fled thither, should be received or not, upon a summary hearing of the cause, and such examination as they could make at present. But the full examination of it was reserved to the judges of the place where the fact was committed.

Shall judge between the slayer and the avenger of blood.] They sent for him out of the city of refuge, to be brought before them; who heard what could be alleged against him, and what he could say for himself.

According to these judgments.] Upon trial they proceeded to give judgment according to the foregoing rules; which, in brief, are these: if a man had no intention to kill another, but it was purely involuntary, he was to be acquitted. If there appeared any design upon his life, or such hatred and enmity as might move them to conclude he had an intention to kill him, he was to be put to death. But here the Hebrew doctors (as Mr. Selden observes) distinguish the killing of a man into three kinds: the first was, when, though it was from pure ignorance and error, yet there was some negligence in it, which a prudent man might have avoided. The second, when a man kills another ignorantly, and cannot be blamed for any negligence, because such a thing seldom happens. An example of the first they make to be, when a man, coming down a ladder, falls upon another and kills him. An example of the second, when going up a ladder, a man happens to do the same. The former is more frequent, and therefore they say hath some kind of blame in it; the other seldomer, and therefore hath none. A third kind, when any man kills another out of ignorance and error also; but it approaches nearer to voluntary murder: as when a man, intending to kill one man, happens to kill another with a stone, or otherwise. In none of these cases, they say, the court of judgment could put any man to death. And the cities of refuge were not provided for the second or third sorts, but only for the first; and that when the man died presently, and did not lie and languish of the wound; for if he did, it might be supposed he died by his own negligence, or otherwise, as well as by the wound. In which case, there was no need that the man who wounded him should flee to the city of refuge; nor could the avenger of blood meddle with him, no more than he could with a father, when he gave his son, or a master, when he gave his scholar, correction, and happened to kill him. The same was the case of him, whose office it was to arrest men, by public authority, and bring them before the judges, if he struck a man that refused to go along with him, and killed him: (see Selden, lib. iv. de Jure Nat. et Gent. juxta Disciplin. Heb. cap. 2.)

Ver. 25. And the congregation shall deliver the slayer out of the hands of the avenger of blood.] If the court found the man was killed casually, as the person accused pretended, (Josh. xx. 4.) then they charged the avenger of blood not to prosecute any further.

Both here, and in the foregoing verse, and in the next words to these, by congregation is meant the judges of the city, (as I observed, ver. 12.) who were to determine in the presence, and in the behalf of the people, whether the manslayer were capable of the privilege of the city of refuge or not; as we read Josh. xx. 4. 6. Now these things (as a very learned person of our own argues), which were done by the elders (or judges), being said to be done by the congregation, or assembly of the people, in whose behalf they were done; it is no wrong to the Holy Scriptures, when we say, that which they report to have been done by the church was acted by the chief power of the apostles and elders, with the consent of the people. For it is manifest in the New Testament, that in the apostles' time all the public acts of the church were passed at the public assemblies of the same. As ordinations, (Acts i. 23. v. 36.) excommunications, (Matt. xviii. 18—20. 1 Cor. v. 4. 2 Cor. ii. 10.) councils, (Acts xv. 4. 22.) and other acts, (2 Cor. vii. 19.) And herewith agrees the primitive custom of the church for divers ages; whereby they gave satisfaction to the people of the integrity of their proceedings, and by the same means obliged superiors to that integrity, by making the proceedings so manifest, and so to preserve the unity of the church. And from this interest of the people in such acts it is, at this day, that the people of the church of England are demanded, what they have to say against ordinations and marriages to be made. (See Mr. Thorndike, in his Rites of the Church in a Christian State, chap. iii. p. 159, &c.)

And the congregation shall restore him to the city of his refuge, whither he was fled.] They were to send him back again, from the place where he was tried, to the city where he had taken refuge, there to remain till the time prescribed in the next words. This was more merciful than the punishment inflicted by the Attic laws (which plainly shew they were borrowed, in great part, from Moses), for he who slew a man involuntarily was forced to fly his country. So the scholiast upon the last of Homer's Iliads, Ἔθος ἦν παρὰ τοῖς παλαιοῖς τὸν ἀκούσιον φόνον ἐργασάμενον, φεύγειν ἐκ τῆς πατρίδος, &c. It was the manner, in ancient times, for a man that had killed another involuntarily, to flee his country; and, betaking himself to some neighbouring place, to sit with his face covered, begging to be expiated. But this was only for a certain time, as Demosthenes tells us (in his oration in Aristocratem): ὁ νόμος κελεύει τὸν ἁλόντα ἐπ' ἀκουσίῳ φόνῳ ἔν τισιν ὡρισμένοις χρόνοις ἀπελθεῖν τακτὴν ὁδὸν, καὶ φεύγειν, &c. The law requires him that is condemned of killing a man involuntarily, for some limited time to go away, and keep at an appointed distance, till he can make his peace with the kindred of him that was slain: after which he may return again, &c.

And he shall abide in it.] Not stir out of the limits of the city, that is, beyond the suburbs, and the two thousand cubits which encompassed them, (ver. 4, 5.) within which bounds he was to keep.

Unto the death of the high-priest, which was anointed with oil.] This looks like a punishment to the manslayer; whereby others were taught to be very watchful over themselves, lest by negligence they chanced to kill any body, and so be forced to leave their own home. But Maimonides takes it for "a prudent charity to the manslayer, and to the relations of him that was slain: for by this means the manslayer was kept out of the sight of the avenger of blood, who might have been tempted, some time or other, to fall upon him, if he had come in his way: but by long absence his anger might be mitigated, at least by the death of the high-priest, the most excellent of all other persons, and most dear to every one in the nation. Which made the public grief so great when he died, that men forgot their private resentments: for nothing could fall out more grievous to all people (saith he) than the death of the high-priest, which swallowed up all other grief." (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 40.) And in the mean time the Jews say, that the citizens of the place were bound to teach him some trade, whereby he might provide himself with necessaries: and he had this comfort also, during his absence from his own family, that the mother of the high-priest sent him many gifts, that he might remain there more contentedly, and not pray for the death of the high-priest. So they tell us, in the place forementioned, Maccoth, cap. 2. sect. 6. where they also observe, that if a man killed the high-priest, or the high-priest himself happened to kill a man involuntarily, they were to stay in the city of refuge as long as they lived: yet they found this temperament, that if one who had been high-priest, but removed from his office, was alive when the slaughter was committed; after his death, both he that killed the high-priest, or any other unawares, and the high-priest himself, who had done the same, were set free from the city of refuge. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 9. sect. 6. and lib. iii. cap. 8. sect. 3.)

There may seem to be some inequality in this law, because, as some high-priests lived long, and others but a short time, so some manslayers fled to the city at the beginning of their priesthood, and others just before their death. But it must be considered, that this could not be better ordered than to make the manslayer's liberty depend upon the death of the high-priest, whensoever it fell out, that a higher value might be set upon him; and that it might represent our deliverance only by the death of the Son of God: of which many great men look upon this as a type, or shadow; though it must be confessed, there is not the least signification of this in the New Testament. And since the great expiation, which the high-priest made every year on the day of atonement, did not procure such men their liberty, I cannot look upon it as the effect of the high-priest's death, but only as that which followed upon it, by virtue of this law. For the high-priest having a great power every where, and particularly in these cities of the priests and Levites, over whom he was the chief, it is possible the manslayer might be confined here by some peculiar act of his authority; which expiring together with himself, he was released.

Ver. 26. But if the slayer shall at any time.] During the life of the high-priest.

Come without the border of the city of refuge, whither he was fled.] If he went beyond the bounds of the fields, in which he had liberty to walk, and might not be touched. For if a tree was planted (as the Mischna resolves in Maccoth) within the borders of the fields of the city, though the boughs stretched themselves beyond the borders, yet the manslayer was safe under the tree. In like manner, when churches became places of refuge, the civil law allowed the privilege to extend to the church gate: and the council of Toledo to thirty paces from the church; which pope Nicholas enlarged to forty. Thus, among the heathen, the bounds of the refuge at the temple of Diana at Ephesus were sometimes more, and sometimes less, as Ritterhusius observes in his book beforenamed, where he shews how far it was extended by Alexander, and afterward farther by others. And Tacitus, lib. iii. Annalium, mentions a temple of hers, to which was granted, by several emperors, "duobus millibus passuum eandem sanctitatem," the same sanctity for two miles round about it.

Ver. 27. And the avenger of blood find him without the borders of the city of his refuge, and the avenger of blood kill the slayer, he shall not be guilty of death.] The court of judgment were not to put him to death; though perhaps he was obnoxious to the judgment of God, because he had killed an innocent person: but he was free from the punishment of the law, that manslayers might be the more careful to keep within their bounds; which was a profitable restraint upon them, for the public good. All men seeing how much God hated murder, by the confinement of him who had slain a man unawares, to a kind of imprisonment.

But it may be said, on the other side, that he who killed a manslayer in this case was perfectly guiltless; because he did not herein act as a private person, but executed a sentence against him, who was condemned by public authority. Which gave no protection to the manslayer, but within the borders of his city of refuge; leaving him to the avenger of blood, if he came out of those bounds, till the death of the high-priest. After which, if the avenger of blood killed him, no doubt he was to be punished as a murderer.

Ver. 28. Because he should have remained in the city of his refuge, until the death of the high-priest.] These words give the reason, why the avenger of blood was not to be punished in this case; because the manslayer was guilty of breaking another law, and so in some sort accessory to his own death; for he might have been safe, if he had pleased.

But after the death of the high-priest, the slayer shall return to the land of his possession.] Where he was not only to remain safe, but to be restored to all his honours, if he had any before he fled to the city of refuge.

Ver. 29. So these things shall be for a statute of judgment unto you.] A rule whereby to judge between manslayers and murderers.

Throughout all generations.] The like clauses are usual in the ancient civil law: "Hoc perpetua lege sancimus. Hoc generali et in perpetuum valitura lege decernimus," &c.

In all your dwellings.] This the Jews interpret as an obligation upon them to have courts of judgment wheresoever they dwell. Thus R. Solomon, upon these very words: "They teach us (saith he) the use of courts of judgment, which ought to be even out of the land, all the time that they were used in the land." So the ancient book Siphri, and many others mentioned by our most learned Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 5. n. 1.

Ver. 30. Whoso killeth any person, the murderer shall be put to death by the mouth of witnesses.] This direction for their proceedings in this case, was to be the rule in all others of like nature, by examining witnesses, who were to be competent. Upon which account ten sorts of persons were incapable to be witnesses, according to the Hebrew doctors; viz. women, servants, minors, fools, the deaf and dumb, the blind, impious, and audacious people, dear relations, and those that had been convicted of bearing false witness: and they endeavour, after their manner, to find reasons against all these in the law itself. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 13. n. 11.)

But one witness shall not testify against any person, to cause him to die.] This was such an established rule in the civil law, that it saith, "ubi numerus testium non adjicitur, sufficiunt duo;" where the number of witnesses is not mentioned, two suffices. "Pluralis enim locutio, duorum numero contenta est:" for where witnesses in the plural number are spoken of, two are enough to answer the intention of the law. Which number, therefore, is frequently mentioned expressly in Scripture, as necessary in all cases, (Deut. xvii. 6.) particularly in this of murder, (xix. 15.) Yet, where there was but one witness, or not two who both together saw the man killed, so that he who was accused of the murder could not be put to death, he was thrown into a very strait prison, and there fed with bread and water of affliction, till his bowels were sorely pinched, &c. if we may believe the Jewish doctors, mentioned by Selden, lib. iv. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 1.

Ver. 31. Moreover, ye shall take no satisfaction for the life of a murderer.] If a murderer would have given all his estate to save his life, or the avenger of blood would have accepted a compensation, or freely let him go, the judges (when they had found him guilty) could not restore him to the city of refuge, but he was to suffer death. For the life of him that was slain, was not (as Maimonides speaks) part of the goods of the avenger of blood, but belonged to Almighty God; who set such a value on a man's life, that he would not suffer any price to be taken for it. (See Selden in the same chapter, p. 470.)

Ver. 32. And ye shall take no satisfaction for him that is fled to the city of refuge, that he may come to dwell in the land, until the death of the high-priest.] No money was to purchase his liberty to dwell any where else but there, till the time appointed by the law: but this punishment for manslaughter, was as indispensable as death for murder. And therefore, if any man happened to kill another in the city of refuge, to which he was confined, he was forced to flee to another city of refuge, and there abide till the death of the high-priest.

Ver. 33. So ye shall not pollute the land wherein ye are; for blood defileth the land.] By this it appears, that the next of kin was bound to prosecute the murderer unto death, for the good of his country, which otherwise would have had a guilt upon it, and that very grievous. For they are the greatest crimes, as Maimonides observes, which are said to pollute the land, or them, or God's sanctuary, viz. idolatry, (Lev. xx. 3.) all the filthiness that is forbidden, xviii. 24, 25. and murder, here mentioned, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 47.)

And the land cannot be cleansed of the blood that is shed therein, but by the blood of him that shed it.] The same Maimonides observes, in the forty-first chapter of that book, "That it is a piece of universal justice, to make a man suffer what he hath made another suffer. If he hath hurt his body, he must suffer for it in his own body; if in his money, his own purse must pay for it; if he have taken away his life, he must die for it himself. And the punishment can neither be mitigated, nor any compensation accepted for it. For which he quotes these words; and upon this account resolves, that if he that was murdered should live a few days or hours after his deadly wound, and, being in sound understanding, should desire he that killeth him might not die for it, declaring that he freely forgave him, his desire was not to be granted, but blood was to be punished with blood: whether he that was slain was a great man or a mean, a freeman or a slave, a wise man or a fool; because there is no sin committed by men greater than this is."

Ver. 34. Defile not therefore the land which ye shall inhabit.] By suffering a murderer to live.

Wherein I dwell.] This is given as a reason elsewhere, (see ver. 3.) why they should put all polluted people out of their camps, because God dwelt in them, viz. in his sanctuary, which made this land be called the Holy Land, and God's possession, (2 Chron. xx. 11.)

For I the Lord dwell among the children of Israel.] See Exod. xxv. 8. The very same was practised among the Athenians, with some little alteration. For Demosthenes says, it was one of their laws τὸν ἐκ προνοίας ἀποκτείναντα θανάτῳ ζημιοῦσθαι, that he who out of forethought killed a man, should be put to death. And he tells us also, that it was not lawful for the judges to take money to remit the punishment after he was condemned: though if the prosecutors compounded with him or his friends beforehand, and desisted from the prosecution, his life was saved. If he fled from justice, all his goods were confiscated, and he forfeited all the rights of a citizen, both civil and sacred. (See Sam. Petitus's Comment. in Leges Atticas, lib. vii. tit. 1.)

CHAP. XXXVI.

Ver. 1. AND the chief fathers of the families of the children of Gilead, the son of Machir, the son of Manasseh, &c.] Not the fathers of those families, whose inheritance had been assigned them already on this side Jordan, in the land of Gilead; but the other half of the tribe of Manasseh, who were to have their inheritance in Canaan, where the daughters of Zelophehad also had their portion, as appears from Josh. xvii. 3, 4, &c.

Came near and spake before Moses, and before the princes, the chief fathers of the children of Israel.] Who were met together in a great assembly, as they used to do about public affairs. (See xxvii. 2. xxxi. xxxii. 2.)

Ver. 2. And they said, The Lord commanded my lord.] This shews that one of them was the mouth of the rest.

To give the land for an inheritance by lot to the children of Israel.] See xxvi. 52, 53. For there the foundation of all these doubts was laid.

And my lord was commanded by the Lord to give the inheritance of Zelophehad.] Which would have fallen to Zelophehad, had he been alive.

Our brother.] So they called their near relations.

Unto his daughters.] Who petitioned him for the possession which should have been their fathers', and it was granted them. (See xxvii. 6, 7.)

Ver. 3. And if they be married to any of the sons of the other tribes of the children of Israel.] They being rich, many, it may be supposed, of the other tribes, as well as their own, would court them for their wives: and if they should choose a husband that was not of their own tribe, they represent to Moses the inconveniences which from thence would follow.

Then shall their inheritance be taken from the inheritance of our fathers.] i. e. Go out of our tribe, to which it originally belonged.

And shall be put to the inheritance of the tribe whereunto they are received.] Become a part of the inheritance of that tribe into which they married.

So shall it be taken from the lot of our inheritance.] For it must have descended unto their children, who were of another tribe by the father's side; which alone was considered, and not the mother's, in this case.

Ver. 4. And when the jubilee of the children of Israel shall be.] Which was ordained for the preserving estates in the tribes and families to which they originally appertained, (Lev. xxv. 10. 13.)

Then shall their inheritance be put unto the inheritance of the tribe whereunto they are received.] The jubilee will not help us in this case, by making their inheritances return as other lands do; because they are become the inheritance of another tribe by the right of marriage.

So shall their inheritance be taken away from the inheritance of the tribe of our fathers.] So will their estate go out of our tribe, without remedy, because the jubilee itself will give us no relief.

Ver. 5. And Moses commanded the children of Israel, according to the word of the Lord.] Whom, I suppose, he consulted about this matter, (as he did when the first doubt was moved about the inheritance of these women, xxvii. 5.) and received the answer by which he here commanded the Israelites to govern themselves.

The tribe of Joseph.] In whose name the chief fathers of their several families made this representation to Moses; as became men who took care of the concerns of the whole tribe.

Hath said well.] In desiring the inheritance of these women might not go out of their tribe, which was prevented by the following law.

Ver. 6. This is the thing which the Lord doth command concerning the daughters of Zelophehad, saying, Let them marry to whom they think best.] They were not confined to any particular persons; but might have their choice among those who were descended from the same stock, as it immediately follows.

Only to the family of the tribe of their father shall they marry.] Only with these two limitations, that they might not marry a man of another tribe, nor a man of another family in their own tribe. For it is very manifest, that they are tied to marry into the family of their father; and accordingly they did actually marry their cousin-germans, as we now speak, (ver. 11.) For this law was made for the preservation of families (as well as of tribes), as the law for the redemption of lands was. And therefore these words, the family of the tribe of their father, are well translated by Grotius, (upon Matt. i. 16.) familia stirpis paternæ, the family of the stock of their father, which was that they desired might not perish, (xxvii. 4.) and was the ground of the law, which commanded a man to marry the wife of his brother, who left no issue, (Deut. xxv. 16.) Therefore, there being several families in the tribe of Manasseh, (xxvi. 29—32.) these women could marry only into the family of the Hepherites.

Ver. 7. So shall not the inheritance of the children of Israel remove from tribe to tribe.] For by preserving it in the family to which it was given, it was necessarily preserved in the tribe.

For every one of the children of Israel shall keep himself to the inheritance of the tribe of his fathers.] And not endeavour to get any part of the inheritance of another tribe, by marrying an heiress in it. Plato himself took care of this, that when a man left only a daughter, his estate should not be carried by her to a stranger, but she should be bound to marry Κατ' ἀγχιστείαν, one that was nearest of kin to her. And if there was a want of near kindred μέχρι μὲν ἀδελφοῦ υἱιδῶν, &c. it should descend to the children of her father's brother, or the children of the grandfather, some of which he ordains should marry her. (Lib. xi. de Legibus, p. 924, 925. edit. Serrani.)

Ver. 8. And every daughter that possesseth an inheritance in any tribe of the children of Israel.] Here this law is made general, that all women who were heiresses, as the daughters of Zelophehad were, should do as they are here commanded. And this was one of the Attic laws, which, as Grotius observes, were plainly borrowed from the law of Moses, Μὴ ἐξεῖναι ταῖς ἐπικλήροις ἔξω τῆς ἀγχιστείας γαμεῖν, &c. That an heiress should not marry out of her kindred, but dispose of herself and estate, τῷ ἐγγύτατα γένους, to one nearest of kin to her; which was one of the laws of Solon, as Sam. Petitus observes out of Isæus, Pollux, and others, in his Comment. in Leges Atticas, lib. vi. tit. 1. p. 441.

Shall be wife to one of the family of the tribe of her father.] Here she is confined to her family, and not merely to her tribe. But this concerned only such as were heiresses: all other women might marry into what tribe they pleased; as appears by those very books, wherein we read that Aaron himself married the sister of the prince of Judah, (Exod. vi. 22.) And if any object, that this was before the giving of the law, it is evident that Jehoida, a priest, and consequently of the tribe of Levi, married king Jehoram's sister, who was of the tribe of Judah, (2 Chron. xxii. 11.) And long before this, all the tribes of Israel, being in great solicitude how to find wives for their brethren of Benjamin, did not scruple their having them out of any tribe, if it had not been for their oath, (Judg. xxi. 18.) And, to add no more, David himself, of the tribe of Judah, married Michal, the daughter of Saul, who was of the tribe of Benjamin.

The Talmudists add, that even these heiresses might marry into what tribe they pleased, after the first division of the land by Joshua: to which they imagine this law was restrained; it being a common saying among them, "that it did not belong to any age, but that in which it was made." In the following ages they pretend a man might purchase land in any tribe, and possess it alway; or have the inheritance of it by marriage, though he were of another tribe, as Selden shews their opinion to be, (lib. de Successionibus ad Leges Hebr. cap. 18. and lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 4. n. 1. and Buxtorf. de Sponsal. et Divortiis, sect. 44.) But this is well confuted by Grotius in his Annotations upon Matt. i. 16.

Ver. 9. Neither shall the inheritance remove from one tribe to another tribe.] This establishes in general what he had said before, (ver. 7.) with particular respect to the daughters of Zelophehad. But Moses ben Nachman, upon these very words, asserts the Talmudic opinion beforementioned, that this concerns only the present time, not future ages. And puts this case (which is the strongest that can be thought of), if a woman were married into another tribe, after which marriage, her father and all her brethren dying without children, the inheritance fell to her, and consequently, saith he, the possession must devolve from one tribe to another, into which she had married. But, according to the letter of these words, the inheritance was rather to descend to the next of her kindred, than by her be carried out of the tribe to which it belonged.

But every one of the tribes of the children of Israel shall keep himself to his own inheritance.] Shall cleave or stick close to his own inheritance, as the Hebrew word signifies; and as the Greek and Latin express it. The reason of the command was, as Procopius Gazæus observes, to prevent the confusion of tribes. How the Vulgar Latin came to deviate so much from the Hebrew text, and from the intention of this law (as it hath done in this and the two preceding verses), I shall not here examine. It is sufficient to note, that Onkelos hath expressed the Hebrew text word for word; and the LXX. do not depart from the sense of it.

Ver. 10. Even as the Lord commandeth Moses, so did the daughters of Zelophehad.] Accordingly they followed this direction when they came into the land of Canaan, and had received their portion there. Now there being no such words added here, as there are in other cases, this shall be unto the children of Israel a statute of judgment, (xxvii. 11.) much less a statute of judgment throughout your generations, (xxxv. 29.) it led, I conjecture, the Talmudic doctors into the forementioned opinion, that this law concerned only the present generation.

Ver. 11. For Mahlah, Tizzah, and Hoglah, and Milkah, and Noah, the daughters of Zelophehad.] Thus they are called both in xxvi. 33. and xxvii. 1. though they are not there mentioned in the same order; for Tizzah is there named last, who is here named in the second place. Perhaps they are set down here in the order wherein they were disposed in marriage; and Tizzah, who was the younger, was married in the second place.

Were married unto their father's brother's sons.] For Hepher, no doubt, had other sons besides Zelophehad, who had issue-male, though Zelophehad had not. What their names were, or how many of them, we do not know; but some suppose them to have been six; one of which died in the wilderness without issue. See Selden, de Successionibus, cap. 23. where he discourses at large of the portion which fell to them in the land of Canaan.

Ver. 12. And they were married into the families, &c.] In the margin, more exactly out of the Hebrew, to some that were of the families; i. e. to one of the families of Manasseh, from whom several families descended, (xxvi. 29, &c.)

And their inheritance remained in the tribe of the family of their father.] The word for tribe signifies sometimes merely a family in a tribe. And so the LXX. (as Grotius observes in the place beforenamed) in this very business, uses sometimes the word δῆμος, and sometimes φυλή; the former of which signifies a part of a whole tribe. And thus Josephus also uses the word φυλή, to signify a family. Mr. Selden hath the same observation in his book de Successionibus, cap. 18. that משפחת is sometimes translated φυλή; and then it signifies not a tribe, but πατριὰν, συγγένειαν, familiam, cognationem, seu genus sanguine proximum; a family, a kindred, or those that are next in blood. But there is no need of these observations, if the words be translated, as they may, rightly; And their inheritance remained in the tribe and the family of their fathers. (See ver. 6.)

Ver. 13. These are the commandments and the judgments which the Lord commanded by the hand of Moses to the children of Israel, in the plains of Moab, by Jordan near Jericho.] He began to deliver the precepts here intended at chapter xxvi. (see ver. 3.) and continues them to this place. By commandments, seem to be meant the precepts about the worship of God, (chap. xxviii. xxix. xxx.) and by judgments, the civil laws about dividing their inheritances, and regulating their descent to their posterity, and establishing cities of refuge for manslayers, which are expressly called a statute of judgment, (xxvii. 11. xxxv. 29.) Some other things are interspersed, as God's commandment to number the people (which was in order to the assigning them their inheritances proportionable to their families), to execute judgment on the Midianites, and to set down in writing their travels in the wilderness; of which I have given an account in their proper places.

DEUTERONOMY.

THIS book had the name of DEUTERONOMY given it by the Greeks, from the principal scope and design of it; which was to repeat unto the Israelites, before Moses left them, the chief laws of God, which had been given them: that they who were not then born when they were first delivered, or were incapable to understand them, or had not sufficiently regarded them, might be instructed in them, and awakened to attend them. (See ver. 1. 5.) In order to this, he premises a short narrative of what had befallen them since they came from Mount Sinai unto this time, in the three first chapters; and then in the fourth urges them, by a most pathetical exhortation, to the observance of those laws which he had taught them, especially the ten commandments, with which he begins the fifth chapter; where he makes a solemn rehearsal of the covenant God made with them in Horeb; and what immediately followed upon the delivery of the law by God himself from Mount Sinai. And then, having earnestly pressed the observation of the first commandment, in the former part of the sixth chapter, and in the latter part of it, and in the several chapters that follow (to the end of the eleventh), reminded them of a great many things which God had done for them, and given them several cautions, lest they let them slip out of their minds, and used many arguments, from several topics (as we call them), to move them to be obedient to all the other commandments; he proceeds in the twelfth chapter, and so forward to the twenty-eighth, to remember them of a great many other laws besides the ten commandments, which he had delivered to them. Some of which he explains; others he enforces with further reasons; and in several places adds new laws for the greater security of the whole, (particularly, he orders the writing of God's law upon stones, when they came into the land of Canaan, chap. xxvii.) and then pronounces those promises which God had made to the obedient, and his threatenings to the disobedient, more largely, and with greater force, than he had done in the twenty-sixth of Leviticus. After which he again remembers them of several wonderful works of God for them, (chap. xxix.) and renews the covenant between God and them; using several arguments to persuade them to a dutiful observance of God's law: which he commands (chap. xxxi.) to be read to all the people in the conclusion of every seventh year, that none might pretend ignorance of it. And then concludes all with a most admirable song, which he orders every one to learn; and with a blessing upon the twelve tribes.

All this was done in the two last months of the last year of Moses's life. But not all at once, as plainly appears by several parts of the book; in which he writes what he delivered to them at several times. Which is the reason of the repetition of the very same thing over and over again: that he might make it sink into their minds by being often inculcated. Some have been so foolish as to make this an objection against this book being composed by Moses. But it shews their great ignorance; all wise men having ever judged it necessary to say, τὰ αὐτὰ περὶ τῶν αὐτῶν, the very same things concerning the same things; that they might be thoroughly understood, and fixed in the memory of their auditors, and settled in their hearts and affections. Particularly Epictetus (as David Chytræus long ago observed) delivered this as a profitable rule in all studies; Εἰδέναι χρὴ, ὅτι οὐ ῥᾴδιον δόγμα παραγενέσθαι ἀνθρώπῳ, εἰ μὴ καθ' ἑκάστην ἡμέραν τὰ αὐτὰ καὶ λέγῃ τις καὶ ἀκούῃ, καὶ ἅμα χρᾶται πρὸς τὸν βίον. This must be known (as a certain truth), that it is not easy for a man to attain the solid knowledge of any thing, unless he both read and hear the same things every day; and also set himself to the practice of them. This course Moses took with the children of Israel: spending every day, it is likely, of the latter end of his life in calling to their mind, again and again, what he had taught them; and the reason they had to do accordingly.

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. THESE be the words.] This book contains the words.

Which Moses spake unto all Israel.] All the people could not hear what he said, but he ordered the elders and heads of the several tribes to communicate to the whole congregation what he delivered to them, in the audience of many of the people who were assembled with them. Thus these words are commonly understood. But, considering the great weight of what is here said, I rather think that Moses himself, at several times, spake what here follows in the ears of the people. (See v. 1.)

On this side Jordan.] The Vulgar Latin having translated the Hebrew words [beeber] on the other side Jordan, it hath furnished some ill-disposed minds with an argument, that Moses was not the author of this book: for he that wrote plainly shews that he was in Canaan when he wrote it. But a very little consideration would have prevented this frivolous objection; there being nothing more certain, than that the Hebrew words signify indifferently, either one side or the other; and may be literally translated, in the passage over Jordan, or as they were about to pass over it; as Huetius observes and proves, by plain examples, that the Hebrews have no other word to express their mind, when they would say either on this side or beyond. (See Demonstr. Evang. propos. iv. cap. 14.) To which another learned writer, since him, (Hermannus Witsius, lib. i. Miscel. Sacr. cap. 14.) hath added several other places, which evidently shew, that beeber is a word that indifferently belongs to either side of any place, (see 1 Sam. xiv. 40.) and must be determined by the matter in hand, to which it is to be applied. And here, undoubtedly, it is to be rendered on this side Jordan. (See iii. 8.)

In the wilderness in the plain.] In the plain of Moab, where they had remained a long while; as appears from the foregoing book, (Numb. xxii. 1. xxvi. 3. 63. xxxi. 12. xxxiii. 48. 59. xxxv. 1. xxxvi. 13.)

Over against the Red Sea.] There is no word in the Hebrew text for sea; and therefore the marginal translation is to be preferred, which is, over against Suph; which was a place in the country of Moab, (see Numb. xxi. 14.) over against which they now lay encamped; but were so far distant from the Red Sea, that there can be no respect to it here.

Between Paran.] He doth not mean the wilderness of Paran frequently mentioned in the foregoing book (for that was as remote from hence as the Red Sea), but some place in the country of Moab, as Suph was, and the rest of the places which here follow.

And Tophel, and Laban, and Hazeroth, and Dizahab.] There was a place called Hazeroth, where they had encamped a long time ago, (Numb. xi. 35. xxxiii. 17.) but it was in another wilderness far from this place, as appears by the account Moses gives of their removals from that place to this, where they now lay, (Numb. xxxiii. 17. 48, 49.) And therefore I take this, and the other three places here mentioned, to have been frontier-towns in the country of Moab, which lay upon the borders of this plain. The last of which, Dizahab, is translated by the LXX. and the Vulgar, as if it signified a place where there were mines of gold.

Onkelos and the Jerusalem Targum, who take Suph to signify the Red Sea, and Paran for the wilderness through which they had come many years ago, &c. are forced to add several words to make out the sense of this verse in this manner: These be the words which Moses spake unto all Israel on this side Jordan, &c. reproving them because they sinned in the desert, and provoked God in the plain over against the Red Sea; and murmured in Paran about manna; and at Hazeroth for flesh, &c. And so they proceed to mention other sins committed in other places; but not in these here named: which they force, from their natural sense, to comply with this conceit.

Ver. 2. There are eleven days' journey from Horeb, &c.] Or eleven days (we were a coming) from Horeb, by the way of Mount Seir, unto Kadesh-barnea. Which cannot be understood of the whole time they spent between these two places, but only of the time they spent in travelling: for they stayed a month at Kibroth-hattaavah, and a week more at Hazeroth, (Numb. xi. 21. xii. 15, 16.) before they came to Kadesh-barnea. This he represents to them, to make them sensible they had been kept in the wilderness so many years as had passed since they came out of Egypt; not because it was a long way to Canaan, but for the reason mentioned in the fourteenth of Numbers. For from Horeb (whither he ordered them to go when they came out of Egypt) they came in eleven days, and took no long journeys, to the borders of the land of Canaan, where Kadesh-barnea lay. So Maimonides; The way was plain and known between Horeb (whither God brought them on purpose to serve him) and Kadesh: which was the beginning of a habitable country; according to what he saith, Numb. xx. 16. (See More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 1. see Numb. xiii. 26.)

By the way of Mount Seir.] The country of the Edomites, (chap. ii. ver. 12.)

Unto Kadesh-barnea.] How they were ordered to come hither, and what they did here, he relates, ver. 6. 19. and so proceeds to give an account of several remarkable things which befel them, unto the time when he wrote these things, which he sets down in the next verse.

Ver. 3. And it came to pass in the fortieth year.] After they came out of Egypt.

In the eleventh month, on the first day of the month.] In the first month of this fortieth year they came into the wilderness of Zin, unto another Kadesh, (Numb. xx. 1.) From whence they removed to Mount Hor; where Aaron died on the first day of the fifth month of this year. See there, ver. 28. where it appears, ver. 29. they mourned for him thirty days, that is, till the beginning of the sixth month. In which they fought with king Arad, (Numb. xxi.) and from Mount Hor travelled from place to place (as we read there, and Numb. xxxiii.) till they came to these plains of Moab. In which journeys, and in the rest of the transactions, mentioned in the latter end of the book of Numbers, they spent the other five months of this year; as I have observed in their proper places. And now began the eleventh month, when Moses, being to leave the world before the end of this year, spake all that follows in this book. And this speech (which he begins ver. 6. and continues to the fortieth verse of the fourth chapter), the great primate of Ireland thinks, he made to the people on the twentieth of February, and on the sabbath-day, as the reader may find in his Annals.

That Moses spake unto the children of Israel, according unto all that the Lord hath given him in commandment unto them.] Made a rehearsal of all that at several times he had received from the Lord, and delivered unto them.

Ver. 4. After he had slain Sihon the king of the Amorites, which dwelt at Heshbon.] About five months ago; for it was after Aaron's death, which was the first day of the fifth month, (Numb. xxxiii. 38.) and they mourned for him all that month. (See Numb. xxi. 21, &c.)

And Og the king of Bashan, which dwelt at Astaroth.] This was a city in the country of Bashan, (Josh. xiii. 31.) and a city it was of very great antiquity, as appears from Gen. xiv. 5. (See there.) From whence some think the famous goddess Astarte had her name, being here worshipped. But whether that goddess took her name from this city, or the city from the goddess, is not certain; as Mr. Selden observes in his Syntagma ii. de Diis Syris, cap. 2. But that the heathen deities were wont to have their names from the groves, mountains, cities, and caves, where they were worshipped, is as certain as it is uncertain from whence Astarte, or Astaroth (as the Scripture name is), was so called.

In Edrei.] His royal palace was at Astaroth (as Sihon's was at Heshbon), but he was slain in Edrei, (Numb. xxi. 33.)

Ver. 5. On this side Jordan, in the land of Moab.] In the plains of Moab; before they passed over Jordan. (See ver. 1.)

Began Moses to declare this law, saying.] To call to remembrance that which any one had forgotten; and to explain that which any one did not understand. So Maimonides expounds these words in Seder Zeraim. "In the end of the fortieth year, in the beginning of the month Shebat, Moses called the people together, saying; The time of my death draws near, if any one, therefore, hath forgot any thing that I have delivered, let him come and receive it; or if any thing seem dubious, let him come that I may explain it. And so they say in Siphri, If any one have forgotten any constitution, let him come and hear it the second time; if he need to have any thing unfolded, let him come and hear the explication of it." For which he quotes this verse; and says that Moses spent all his time in this, from the beginning of the month Shebat to the seventh day of Adar. And what he now said was likely to be more regarded, because these were, in a manner, his dying words; for he lived but till the seventh day of the next month; and seems to have composed this book as a compendium of his whole law, for the familiar use of the children of Israel; from whence it is called Deuteronomy, i. e. a second law. (See Huetius in his Demonstr. Evang. propos. iv. cap. 1.)

Ver. 6. The Lord our God spake unto us in Horeb, saying.] Numb. x. 13.

Ye have dwelt long enough in this mount.] From the third month of the first year (Exod. xix. 1.) to the twentieth day of the second year after they came out of Egypt, (Numb. x. 11.) they stayed at Mount Sinai, which is the same with Horeb, they being only two tops of the same mountain, one of them something higher than the other, as they are described by those who have taken a view of them. For Moses was twice with God, for the space of forty days, in this mount: and here the tabernacle and all things belonging to it were made, according to the orders he there received; and then was erected and consecrated; and the people all numbered and disposed under several standards, to march in such order as God appointed, (Numb. ii. 3. 10. 17, &c. x. 14, 15, &c.)

Ver. 7. Turn you.] From this mountain.

And take your journey.] Resume your journey, which you have so long intermitted.

And go to the mount of the Amorites.] A mount on the south part of Canaan, inhabited by the Amorites, together with some Canaanites and Amalekites, (Numb. xiv. 25. 43. 45.) But the principal possessors of it were Amorites, as is expressed more than once in this chapter, ver. 19, 20. 44. This is the mountain to which Moses bade the spies go up, Numb. xiii. 17. and so they did, ver. 22.

And unto all the places nigh thereunto.] And so pass into all the neighbouring country which lies near it.

In the plains, in the hills, and in the vale.] This is a description of the country nigh unto this mountain; some of which was champion (as we speak), and other parts of it consisted of hills and dales.

And in the south, and by the sea-side, to the land of the Canaanites, and unto Lebanon, and unto the great river, the river Euphrates.] And so go into all the rest of the land of Canaan: the several quarters of which he here sets forth. The southern part lying towards this mountain; the western upon the sea (where the people properly called Canaanites dwelt); the northern towards Lebanon; and the eastern towards the river Euphrates. Which by other authors, as well as Moses, is called the great river. So Callimachus, in his hymn to Apollo, v. 103.

Ἀσσυρίου ποταμοῖο μέγας ῥόος——

The great flood of the Assyrian river; which the scholiast observes is meant of Euphrates. And Lucan,

——"Cum Tigride magnus Euphrates"—— Lib. iii. ver. 253.

Ver. 8. Behold, I have set the land.] In the Hebrew, given the land, i. e. bestowed it upon you, and am ready to bring you into possession of it.

Before you.] That every one of you may have his share of it. Or, that you may go whither you please, and settle yourselves in it, (Gen. xiii. 9. xxxiv. 10.)

Go in and possess the land.] Therefore make no longer stay here in the wilderness; but go and take possession of my gift.

Which the Lord sware unto your fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, &c.] Gen. xv. 18. xvii. 7, 8. xxvi. 3. xxviii. 13.

Ver. 9. And I spake unto you at that time, saying.] About the time of their coming to Horeb, or Mount Sinai. For the story of Jethro, unto which this relates, preceded that immediately, (Exod. xviii.) Many great men place it after the giving of the law: of which, see Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 2. n. 4.

I am not able to bear you alone.] We do not read, before now, that Moses spake thus to the people. But Jethro spake in this manner to him, Exod. xviii. 18. and gave him advice to take some others to his assistance, (ver. 21.) which advice he followed, (ver. 24.) And then spake to the people what Jethro had said to him; and enlarged upon it, in the words we read here, in the following verses: where he gives them the reason why he could not perform the office of a judge alone.

Ver. 10. The Lord your God hath multiplied you; and, behold, ye are this day as the stars of heaven for multitude.] Increased unto a greater number than can easily be told.

Ver. 11. The Lord God of your fathers make you a thousand times so many as you are.] As if he had said, I am not troubled at your vast increase, but bless God for it; and beseech him to make you a thousand times more numerous than at present you are.

And bless you, as he hath promised you.] In the promise often repeated to their fathers, (Gen. xii. 2. xv. 5. xvii. 5, 6, xviii. 18. xxii. 17. xxvi. 4. xxviii. 14.)

Ver. 12. How can I myself alone bear your cumbrance, and your burden, and your strife?] But how is it possible for one man alone to undergo the labour of hearing all the complaints of such a multitude; and of remedying all their grievances, and determining all their controversies? So the last word signifies, suits at law (as we speak), as the two former signify other differences, which arose between one man and another, about such things as are mentioned in the twenty-first, twenty-second, and twenty-third chapters of Exodus. The first word, which we translate cumbrance, signifies tædiosam litigantium serram, (as Hottinger interprets it, in his Smegma Orientale, lib. i. cap. 6.) the tedious pleadings of those that manage causes before a judge, by bills and answers (suppose) and rejoinders, &c.

Ver. 13. Take ye.] In the Hebrew it is give ye, i. e. present unto me such persons as you think fit, according to the following characters.

Wise men, and understanding, and known among your tribes.] Men of known wisdom, prudence, and integrity; skilful in Divine and human laws. (See Exod. xviii. 21.) Some take wise men to signify such as knew much; and understanding, such as had prudence to make use of their knowledge, being men of experience, and they were to be noted for both these; otherwise the people would not have reverenced them.

Ver. 14. And ye answered me, and said, The thing which thou hast spoken is good for us to do.] This consent of the people is not recorded before; but sufficiently implied in their submission to this regulation, mentioned Exod. xviii. 26.

Ver. 15. So I took the chief of your tribes, wise men, and known.] From among those men that they presented to him, he took, I suppose, such persons among the chief of their tribes, as were endowed with the qualities here named, and were known by all so to be. For obscure persons, either for birth, or experience in affairs, would have been contemned: and therefore he chose the noblest of those that were presented to him (called here the chief of their tribes), if they were no less worthy than others. For some such, no doubt, there were among their great men, as might be thought fit for this high employment. And they were the fitter, because, being men of quality (as we speak), they were less liable to be corrupted by bribery. From which Moses took care all judges should be so free, that he expressly requires they should be men hating covetousness, (Exod. xviii. 21.) And Solon did not forget to make this a part of the oath, which every judge in Athens took (which is mentioned at large by Demosthenes: in his oration against Timocrates) οὐδὲ δῶρα δέξομαι τῆς ἡλιάσεως ἕνεκα, οὔτ' αὐτὸς ἐγὼ, οὔτ' ἄλλος ἐμοὶ, &c. I will receive no gift upon the account of my sentence; neither I myself, nor any body else for me, nor others with my knowledge, by any artifice or device whatsoever.

And made them heads over you.] Set them to govern and rule the people, (as it is expressed ver. 13.) by deciding all causes which were brought before them; as far as they were able to understand them.

Captains over thousands, and captains over hundreds, and captains over fifties, and captains over tens.] It is a question, whether they were commanders over so many families, or persons; as I observed upon Exod. xviii. 25. Hermannus Conringius thinks they were rulers (as the word signifies) over so many fathers of families, understanding by a family that which we now call a household, (De Republ. Hebræorum, sect. 18.)

And officers among your tribes.] The same great man, in the twenty-sixth section of the same book, takes schotrim to have been judges, as well as the rest. His great reason is, because the seventy elders were ordered to be chosen out of them, among others, (Numb. xi. 16.) Now it is altogether improbable, he thinks, that such a prophetical college as that was, should be chosen out of such mean officers, as the Hebrew doctors make these schotrim to have been. But see what I have noted upon Exod. v. 14. and Numb. xi. 16. And let me here add, that if they were judges (and not attendants upon them), they were very mean ones, being put below the rulers of ten. But howsoever this be, it is certain some of these judges had greater authority than others, being entrusted with a larger jurisdiction; and, it is likely, greater abilities were required in those over thousands, than in those over tens. As in the great Sanhedrin afterward, the Jews make more things necessary to qualify men for a place in it, than were requisite for those in lower courts; where no man could sit (much less in the highest) unless these seven things were remarkable in him, as Maimonides saith, (Halacah Sanhedrin, cap. 4. sect. 7.) wisdom, humility, the fear of God, contempt of riches, love of truth, a good fame; and he was beloved also of others.

Ver. 16. And I charged your judges at that time, saying.] As the quality of their persons and their endowments made them considerable, so they were dignified with the honourable name of schofetim, and were also called elders, which had been a long time a title of honour among the Jews, and in other nations.

Hear the causes between your brethren.] This was a necessary quality in a good judge, to give audience to every one that brought a cause before him; and not to delay any man. But the Jews infer from these words, that it was not lawful to hear any man when his adversary was absent; but both parties were to be there present. And they were also to be heard speak for themselves, if they pleased: which was part of the forenamed oath which Solon ordered all the Athenian judges to take, Ἀκροάσομαι τοῦ τε κατηγόρου καὶ τοῦ ἀπολογουμένου ὁμοίως ἀμφοῖν, I will hear the accuser and the defender, both alike.

And judge righteously.] The next thing required of a judge, was to be upright and impartial, not considering what the man was, but his cause. This is implied in the following words.

Between every man and his brother.] i. e. Between one Israelite and another.

And the stranger that is with you.] i. e. Between an Israelite and a proselyte: whether he were received into the covenant by circumcision, or not. For of this latter sort there were, no doubt, a great number, amongst that mixed multitude, who came with them out of Egypt, (Exod. xii. 38.) And while they were in the wilderness, there was not a distinct court for Israelites and proselytes; but their causes were tried in one and the same, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. de Synedriis, cap. 3. n. 1.

Ver. 17. And ye shall not respect persons in judgment.] Not be swayed by particular affection or interest; but judge sincerely, without respect to relation, or any benefit or injury received.

Ye shall hear the small as well as the great.] Be equally disposed patiently to attend to the cause of a poor man, as of a great; and to do him as speedy and impartial justice. (See Lev. xix. 15.) And here the Hebrew doctors tell us of some singular practices in their courts, to preserve the dispensation of exact justice: for if one of the contending parties came into them richly clothed, and the other poorly, they would not hear them till both were clothed alike. Nor would they suffer one of them to sit, and the other stand; but both of them either sat, or stood. And if they sat, one of them was not permitted to sit higher than the other; but they sat by each other's side, &c. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 13. n. 10.)

Ye shall not be afraid of the face of men.] Courage and undaunted resolution is another necessary qualification in a judge; who must not be overawed by what any man can do unto him; but remember (as it here follows) that he is in God's place.

For the judgment is God's.] God gave them their commission by Moses; so that they were his ministers, and acted by his authority: and therefore might be confident he would defend them in the discharge of their office. This shews, that though Moses alone acted by immediate authority from God, yet these always being constituted by him, were to be looked upon as pronouncing sentence in his name; who, after a peculiar manner, was the King and supreme Governor of the people of Israel.

And the cause which is too hard for you, bring it unto me, and I will hear it.] Another quality is humility, in not adventuring to judge of things above their reach. Some think there were certain causes reserved to the cognizance of Moses, (as I observed upon Exod. xviii. 12.) but the contrary appears by these words, that all manner of causes were brought before these judges; and they, not the people, brought such causes before Moses, as they found too hard for them to determine. So that they, not the person whose cause it was, judged of the difficulty of the cause. (See Selden, lib. i. de Synedriis, cap. 16.)

Ver. 18. And I commanded you at that time all the things that ye should do.] As he rightly informed their judges, so he instructed the people also in their duty, before they went from Horeb, by delivering to them the judgments which God commanded him to set before them, Exod. xxi. 1. contained in that and in the two following chapters; whereby both they and their judges were to govern themselves.

Ver. 19. And when we departed from Horeb.] See Numb. x. 2.

We went through all that great and terrible wilderness.] It may well be called great because it extended a great way. For after three days' journey (Numb. x. 12.) they settled at Kibroth-hattaavah; which was in this wilderness of Paran. From whence they went to Hazeroth, which is still said to be in this wilderness, (Numb. xi. 35.) And when they went from thence, they were in the same wilderness, (xii. 16.) where Kadesh was, (xiii. 26. and see xxxiii. 19.) And this wilderness was very terrible, or dreadful; because there were no inhabitants in it but wild beasts.

Which you saw by the way of the mountain of the Amorites.] All the way you went towards that mountain. (See ver. 7.)

As the Lord our God commanded us.] According to the direction which God gave them, by the motion of the cloud that went before them.

And we came to Kadesh-barnea.] Where they rested at the foot of that mountain, in the wilderness of Paran, (Numb. xiii. 2. 26.)

Ver. 20. And I said unto you, Ye are come to the mountain of the Amorites, which the Lord our God doth give unto us.] For this was part of the country which God bestowed upon them for their possession; as appears from Numb. xxxiv. 4. where Kadesh-barnea is mentioned as a frontier-place in their south border. And indeed the Amorites, wheresoever they found them, were to be expelled; as they had already dispossessed them of the whole kingdom of Sihon, who was king of the Amorites, (Numb. xxi. 21. 25, 26.)

Ver. 21. Behold, the Lord thy God hath set the land before thee.] All the country beyond this mountain, (ver. 8.)

Go up.] For there was a great ascent to it, (Numb. xiii. 17.)

And possess it.] Enter upon the possession of it.

As the Lord God of thy fathers hath said unto thee.] According to the promise made by God long ago, to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, (see ver. 8.) which he is now ready to perform.

Fear not, neither be discouraged.] Do not dread either their number or their strength; but trust in the Lord (whose name he repeats four times in these three verses), that he will make good his word.

Ver. 22. And ye came near unto me every one of you.] The heads of every tribe, in the name of the whole congregation, whose desire this was.

And said, We will send men before us.] Some select persons.

And they shall search out the land.] Give us an account how it lies, and what kind of country it is.

And bring us word again by what way we shall go up.] Inform us which way to direct our march into it.

And into what cities we shall come.] What cities we shall first attack, to make our way the clearer into the country. Moses also charges the men that went to search the land with many other inquiries, (Numb. xiii. 18—20.) that the people might receive the fullest satisfaction.

Ver. 23. And the saying pleased me well.] He thought this a reasonable motion, proceeding only from a prudent caution; whereas, in truth, they were timorous and distrustful of God's promise.

And I took twelve men of you, one of a tribe.] That every body might be satisfied when they heard the report of their brethren, Numb. xiii. 2—4, &c. and God directed him so to do, as we read there.

Ver. 24. And they turned.] From Kadesh-barnea.

And went up into the mountain.] Numb. xiii. 17. 21.

And came into the valley of Eshcol.] It appears by the relation, (Numb. xiii. 21—23.) that this was the last place unto which they came when they had ended their search.

And searched it out.] After they had gone through all the quarters of the country.

Ver. 25. And they took of the fruit of the land, in their hands, and brought it down unto us.] Both grapes, pomegranates, and figs, (Numb. xiii. 23.)

And brought us word again, and said, It is a good land which the Lord our God doth give us.] So they all said unanimously, and brought along with them a demonstration of it; (Numb. xiii. 27.) only they added, that they were not able to deal with the inhabitants of it.

Ver. 26. Notwithstanding ye would not go up, but rebelled against the commandment of the Lord your God.] Who bade you go up and not be afraid, (ver. 8. 21.) Which was the greater sin, because he had not only brought them to the borders of the land, but convinced them that he had not deluded them with fair promises of a better country than really it was: for they all saw the goodly fruit which it produced; and ought therefore to have believed he would fulfil his word, and give them the possession of it.

Ver. 27. And ye murmured in your tents.] After great lamentations for a whole night together, (Numb. xiv. 1.)

And said, Because the Lord hated us, he hath brought us forth out of the land of Egypt.] Unto which therefore they desired and conspired to return, (Numb. xiv. 4.)

To deliver us into the hand of the Amorites, to destroy us.] Nothing can be more pernicious (as Grotius here observes) than a persuasion that God doth not love us, but hath a design upon us, to destroy us.

Ver. 28. Whither shall we go up?] Moses, I suppose, still pressed them to go up, and take possession of the land: to which they gave him this snappish answer.

Our brethren have discouraged our hearts.] The men that you yourself sent to search the land, dispirited us by the report they have brought us. Which would not have had that effect upon them, if they had minded one part of it as much as the other, and calmly considered what Caleb and Joshua said, who made no doubt of success.

Saying, The people is greater and taller than we.] More numerous, and of far greater stature and strength, (Numb. xiii. 28. 33.)

Their cities are great, and walled up to heaven.] The spies only told them, that their cities were walled, and very great, (Numb. xiii. 28.) but their fear and confusion of thoughts augmented the danger of attempting the conquest of them: yet Moses himself thinks good afterward to use the same hyperbole, (ix. 1.) which is common in the best authors. For thus Homer, in Odyss. E. ver. 239. speaks of a fir-tree as high as heaven, i. e. exceeding tall:

——— ἐλάτη δ' ἦν οὐρανομήκης.

Many other instances may be seen in Bochartus's Phaleg. lib. i. cap. 13.

And moreover, we have seen the sons of the Anakims there.] See Numb. xiii. 28. 33. Const. L'Empereur will rather have it translated the sons of the giants, as the LXX. and Onkelos take it. Yet he acknowledges that Anak seems to have been the first parent and propagator of the race of giants after the flood; and, therefore, it may be properly translated as we do. (See Annot. in Itiner. Benjamini Tudelensis, p. 136.)

Ver. 29. Then I said unto you.] Moses here at large relates what he said unto their fathers upon this occasion; which he doth not mention in the book of Numbers (where we read only of his falling down before God), that he might awaken this generation to a greater confidence in God, and a dread of his judgment.

Dread not, nor be afraid of them.] Do not consider so much how strong they are, as how powerful the Lord your God is, who hath promised you this good land.

Ver. 30. The Lord your God which goeth before you.] In a glorious pillar of cloud and fire.

He shall fight for you.] As he had done hitherto, (Exod. xiv. 14. xvii. 8, &c.)

According to all that he did for you in Egypt before your eyes.] Why should you think he is less able to bring you into Canaan, than he was to redeem you from Egypt, where you were oppressed by very powerful enemies?

Ver. 31. And in the wilderness.] Ever since they came from thence through the wilderness of the Red Sea, (Exod. xiii. 18.) and in the wilderness of Sin, (Exod xvi. 1.) and the wilderness of Sinai, (Exod. xix. 1, 2.) and then through that terrible wilderness of Paran. (See above, ver. 19.)

Where thou hast seen how the Lord thy God bare thee, as a man doth bear his son.] The long experience they had of his tender care he had over them (which was as indulgent as that of a kind father towards his only son, when he is a child, whom he carries in his arms), should have made them confident of his gracious providence for the future.

In all the way that ye went, until ye came to this place.] He made provision for them in the most desolate places; bringing them water out of a rock; sending bread down to them from heaven; defending them from wild beasts, and from their fiercer enemies, &c.

Ver. 32. Yet in this thing ye did not believe the Lord your God.] He could not prevail with them to trust God; and go up, as he commanded, in his power and might to possess the land. Nor could all that Caleb and Joshua said at all move them, (Numb. xiv. 7—9.)

Ver. 33. Who went in the way before you.] Never failed constantly to direct and guide you in your journeys, (Exod. xiii. 22.)

To search you out a place to pitch your tents in.] But always marked out your encampments where they should be, (Numb. x. 17.)

In fire by night, to shew you by what way you should go, and in a cloud by day.] That they might be able to travel by night, as well as by day: which was most convenient in summer-time, when the sun was very scorching in a wilderness where there was no shelter, (Exod. xiii. 21. Numb. x. 16. 21.)

Ver. 34. And the Lord heard the voice of your words.] They not only distrusted God, (ver. 32.) but murmured against their leaders, and against God, in a mutinous manner; consulting to return into Egypt, (Numb. xiv. 1—4.) And moreover spake of stoning Caleb and Joshua for their good advice, (ver. 10.)

And was wroth, and sware, saying.] Which so provoked the Divine Majesty, that he irrevocably determined what follows; confirming it with an oath, (Numb. xiv. 21.)

Ver. 35. Surely there shall not one of these men of this evil generation see that good land, &c.] See Numb. xiv. 21. 28, 29.)

Ver. 36. Save Caleb the son of Jephunneh.] And Joshua the son of Nun. (See xiv. 24. 30. and see below, ver. 38.)

He shall see it, and to him will I give the land that he hath trodden upon, &c.] This was as exactly fulfilled as their disinheriting was, Josh. xiv. 9. 12. where the particular portion of land is mentioned which God promised to him, and which Joshua gave him in the mountain where the Anakims dwelt. For such was the wonderful faith and courage of Caleb, that he doubted not to dispossess those whom the rest of the Israelites dreaded as invincible.

Ver. 37. Also the Lord was angry with me.] Not at that time, but afterward; when they came into the wilderness of Zin, to another Kadesh, (Numb. xx. 1. 12.)

For your sakes.] By occasion of their fresh discontents and mutinous upbraidings of him, (Numb. xx. 2—4.) which provoked him so, that he spake unadvisedly with his lips; as the Psalmist observes, Psal. cvi. 31, 32. This was a high aggravation of their guilt; that they not only undid themselves, but brought great displeasure upon their worthy leader and governor, whom they wearied with their tumults and rebellions. Or the meaning may be (which doth not much differ from the account now given), that they murmuring in a tumultuous manner, when they saw the water did not flow out of the rock at the first stroke, he himself also was put into such a commotion, that he began to doubt, and say God would do nothing for such a rebellious people, though he had declared he would. If this be true, he soon recovered himself, and smote the rock again, in confidence God would be as good as his word. But God was so angry at the words he had spoken, that he so far punished him for them, as to deny him entrance into Canaan.

Saying, Thou shalt not go in thither.] Which threatening is renewed a little before his death, (Numb. xxvii. 13, 14.) and he could not get repealed by any entreaties, as we read in this book, iii. 26.

Ver. 38. But Joshua the son of Nun, which standeth before thee.] i. e. Waits upon thee.

He shall go in thither.] So God promised, when he, as well as Caleb, endeavoured to put courage into the people to go and possess the land, (Numb. xiv. 6, 7, &c. 30.)

Encourage him, for he shall cause Israel to inherit it.] Not only go thither, and have his portion there, but be the captain of Israel, and conquer the land for them, and divide it among them. This intimates as if Joshua was afraid he might be excluded as well as his master; being extremely troubled, it is likely, that he was not suffered to reap the fruit of his long labours. Therefore God bids Moses encourage his hope, and command him to take heart (as we speak), for undoubtedly he should do more than go into Canaan. Which may be the reason why his name is not put into the exception, (ver. 35, 36.) together with Caleb's; but they are mentioned separately, because there was something to be said peculiar to each of them.

Ver. 39. Moreover, your little ones, whom ye said should be a prey.] See Numb. xiv. 31.

Which in that day had no knowledge of good and evil.] And, consequently, did not provoke God by their disobedience.

They shall go in thither, &c.] Their innocence moved pity towards them: though children, in some cases, were cut off for their fathers' sins.

Ver. 40. But as for you, turn you.] From the land of Canaan; to which they were not permitted to go.

And take your journey into the wilderness.] And get you back again into the wilderness, out of which I have brought you, (Numb. xiv. 25.)

By the way of the Red Sea.] Thus they had their desire, in some part, of returning into Egypt, (Numb. xiv. 4.) which was not far from the Red Sea.

Ver. 41. Then you answered and said unto me, We have sinned against the Lord.] They repented when it was too late to do them any good. (See Numb. xiv. 40.)

We will go up, and fight, according to all that the Lord our God commanded us.] Now they resolve to encounter those enemies of whom they were before so afraid, as to speak of stoning those who exhorted them not to fear them, (Numb. xiv. 9, 10.)

And when you girded on every man his weapons of war, ye were ready to go up into the hill.] They not only made a stout resolution, but actually prepared themselves for the onset: as if there were no difficulty in that, which a little before they dreaded to think of. So De Dieu translates the last words, Ye thought it an easy matter to ascend the hill; or, ye despised going up the mountain; in our language, made nothing of it.

Ver. 42. And the Lord said unto me, Say unto them, Go not up.] See Numb. xiv. 41, 42.

Neither fight.] Much less think of fighting.

For I am not among you.] By my powerful presence to subdue your enemies, or to defend you from them (so the phrase is often used); for the ark of the covenant, the token of God's presence, did not go with them, (Numb. xiv. 44.)

Lest ye be smitten before your enemies.] Which would be a far greater disgrace than marching away from them.

Ver. 43. So I spake unto you.] See Numb. xiv. 42, 43.

And ye would not hear.] No more than before; when he bade them go up.

And rebelled against the commandment of the Lord.] For now it was against his will, as before it was his will, that they should go up.

And went presumptuously up into the hill.] Would venture against the express command of God, which was the highest presumption.

Ver. 44. And the Amorites which dwelt in that mountain came out against you.] As soon as they saw the Israelites ascend to assault them, they came down upon them, (Numb. xiv. 45.)

And chased you, as bees do.] Which pursue those that disturb their hives in great swarms, and with great fury, (Psal. cxviii. 12.) For though bees have very small bodies, yet they have great spirits, and a vast force, as Bochart observes in many instances, to make out the aptness of this comparison, in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 10.

And destroyed you in Seir.] It seems they fled towards that part of Idumea where Mount Seir was; which they afterward compassed many days, (ii. 1.) when they removed from Kadesh-barnea. And there some of them fell by the sword of the Amorites, who were the fiercest of all the people of Canaan, and might, on that account, be well compared to bees, who cease not their pursuit till they have fixed their stings.

Even unto Hormah.] See Numb. xiv. 45.

Ver. 45. And ye returned.] After the Amorites retreated.

And wept before the Lord.] Beseeching him to go along with you, and assist you to conquer the land.

But the Lord would not hearken to your voice, nor give ear unto you.] To consent that they should now go and possess the promised land, or stay near to it; but remained fixed in his resolution, that they should go back again, and wander in the wilderness as long as they lived.

Ver. 46. So ye dwelt in Kadesh many days.] God had commanded Moses to lead them into the wilderness, by the way of the Red Sea, the very next morning after their mutiny upon the return of the spies, (Numb. xiv. 25.) But they prevented this, by their early rising next morning to assault the Amorites in the mountain, (ver. 40.) After which they being discomfited, he permitted them to stay some time here to bemoan themselves. But how long, is not certain: for sometime the cloud stayed but two days; sometime a month, sometime a year, before it stirred from the tabernacle; which was the sign of their removal, (Numb. x. 22.) And in some stations, it is likely, they stayed several years: for from the time of their removal from Kadesh-barnea, till they came to Mount Hor, which was thirty-seven years, we find but nineteen stations. (See Numb. xxxiii. 18—37.)

According to the days that ye abode there.] Some expound it, As long as they did in all the rest of their stations, i. e. nineteen years, as the Jews compute in Seder Olam. But, as the learned Dr. Lightfoot thinks, it signifies, as long as they did at Mount Sinai: and so they stayed near a whole year, as they had done at Sinai. But the most simple explication seems to be, that they tarried here so long after this, as they had done before it, at least forty days; which was the time the spies spent in searching out the land. Though there is no necessity to confine it to that number, but simply to interpret it, that as they stayed there many days before this mutiny, so they did as many after it.

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. AND we turned, &c.] From the borders of the land of Canaan, to go southward, till they came to the very shore of the Red Sea. Which, as David Chytræus computes it, was thirty German miles from Kadesh-barnea.

As the Lord spake unto me.] According to the command formerly mentioned, Numb. xiv. 25.

And we compassed Mount Seir.] The mountainous country of Edom; whereof Mount Seir was but a part. For when they came to Ezion-Gaber, which was upon the Red Sea, they were still in the country of Edom, (1 Kings ix. 26. 2 Chron. viii. 17.) For it stretched a long way; from the confines of Canaan, unto Elath and Ezion-Gaber, on the Red Sea.

Many days.] Some think that they were marching to and fro along the borders of this country, all the time they spent from this removal, till they returned to go towards Canaan again. So that by many days, they understand the whole thirty-eight years which passed between their departure from Kadesh-barnea till they came over the brook Zered, (ver. 14.) For when they were at Ezion-Gaber (which was farthest from Canaan), they were, as I said, upon the borders of Edom: and so they were when they came back again, seven-and-thirty years after at Mount Hor, (Numb. xx. 23. xxi. 4.) But this must not be understood, as if all the stations mentioned Numb. xxxiii. after they left Kadesh-barnea till they came hither again, were near to the country of Edom: some of them might be remote, though they all lay in that wilderness, which reached from one end of Idumea to the other.

Ver. 2. And the Lord spake unto me, saying.] This was in the end of the thirty-ninth year after their coming out of Egypt; when they had spent thirty-seven years going to and fro since their departure from Kadesh-barnea. In all which time he gives us no account what passed, either in the foregoing book, or in this: but only sets down the places of their abode, as I observed in the thirty-third of Numbers.

Ver. 3. Ye have compassed this mountain long enough.] i. e. The mountainous country of Edom, mentioned ver. 1.

Turn ye northward.] From Ezion-Gaber, which was in the south, towards the north, that is, directly towards the land of Canaan.

Ver. 4. And command thou the people, saying, Ye are to pass through the coast of your brethren the children of Esau, which dwell in Seir.] For they went from Ezion-Gaber to Kadesh, (Numb. xx. 1.) and from thence to Mount Hor, (ver. 22. which was in the edge of the land of Edom, Numb. xxxiii. 37.) and from thence they travelled to compass the land of Edom, (xxi. 4.) i. e. the eastern quarter of it. So that though they did not pass through the coast of Edom, as we translate it, yet they passed by it, and very near unto it; as the particle beth frequently signifies, (Gen. xxxvii. 13. Josh. v. 13. 1 Sam. xxix. 1.) Though they may be truly said to pass through their coast, if thereby we understand their border, or the confines of their country.

And they shall be afraid of you.] Lest, wanting a settlement, the Israelites should seize upon their country. Accordingly we find, they raised all the force they could make to oppose them, Numb. xx. 20.

Take ye good heed to yourselves therefore.] Let not that encourage you to assault them.

Ver. 5. Meddle not with them.] Make not the least attempt upon them.

For I will not give you of their land; no, not so much as a foot-breadth.] i. e. Not the smallest portion.

Because I have given Mount Seir unto Esau for a possession.] So Joshua saith expressly, Josh. xxiv. 4. wherein he made good the blessing of Isaac, (Gen. xxvii. 39.)

Ver. 6. Ye shall buy meat of them for money, that ye may eat, &c.] If you have a mind to any provision that their country affords, you shall not take it, but purchase it; as they did their very water, (ver. 29.) which was a scarce thing in those dry countries. And so the Israelites offered to do, when they treated with them about a passage through their country, (Numb. xx. 19.)

Ver. 7. For the Lord thy God hath blessed thee in all the works of thy hand.] Or, though the Lord hath blessed thee, &c. that is, though there is no need of it, God having abundantly provided you with all things necessary. But if we follow our translation, the sense is plain: You have wherewith to buy of them what you need or desire; therefore do not take it away by force.

He knoweth thy walking through this great wilderness.] Hath directed and prospered thee (as the world knoweth signifies in many places, Psal. i. 6. xxxi. 7.) in thy travels through a dangerous wilderness.

These forty years the Lord thy God hath been with thee; thou hast lacked nothing.] He had mercifully provided for them so constantly, that he let them want nothing necessary for their support. This was the sum of the argument why they should not molest the Edomites, nor take any thing by stealth from them, because they were in no need; and God hath given that country to the children of Esau, as he intended to give Canaan to the Israelites.

Their being in the wilderness forty years, is mentioned also viii. 2. xxix. 5. besides other places of Scripture. For, from the fifteenth day of the first month, in which their fathers came out of Egypt, (Numb. xxxiii. 5.) to the tenth day of the same month in which they went over Jordan into Canaan, (Josh. iv. 19.) there were but five days wanting of complete forty years. I cannot but here note also, that this is one of those places wherein Onkelos mentions the Memra, i. e. Word of Jehovah, which can signify nothing but a Divine person: for thus he translates these words, The Word of the Lord thy God hath been thy helper; thou hast not wanted any thing.

Ver. 8. And when we had passed by from our brethren the children of Esau, which dwelt in Seir, through the way of the plain.] i. e. Through the wilderness of Zin.

From Elath, and from Ezion-Gaber.] Two places upon the Red Sea; the last of which [Ezion-Gaber] signifies as much as the spine, or backbone of a man. So called, because there were great ragged rocks in that port (as Bochart observes), like those at Dyrrachium in Macedonia; which had its name also from thence, (lib. i. Canaan, cap. 44.)

We turned.] After they were denied passage through their country, and had gone through those stations mentioned Numb. xxxiii. 41, 42, &c.

And passed by the wilderness of Moab.] See Numb. xxi. 11. Going by the east side of their country, (Judg. xi. 18.)

Ver. 9. And the Lord said unto me, Distress not the Moabites, neither contend with them in battle.] He would not have them force their way through his country; because the king of Moab refused them a passage, as the king of Edom had done, (Judg. xi. 17.) For their country now was but small, since Sihon king of the Amorites had taken from them all the best of it, which lay between Arnon and Jabbok; of which the Israelites had possessed themselves by the conquest of Sihon. So that they had only that portion remaining which lay upon the Dead Sea; which David, in aftertimes, subdued.

For I will not give thee of their land for a possession.] No more than of Edom, (ver. 5.)

Because I have given Ar.] It is likely the capital city gave name to the whole country about it. At least Ar (which was the chief city of Moab, Numb. xxi. 15. 28.) is put here for all the land of Moab; as Mount Seir for all the land of Edom, (ver. 1.)

Unto the children of Lot for a possession.] Though the Moabites were now a wicked people; yet for their pious ancestor's sake, from whom they were descended, God would not have them dispossessed.

Ver. 10. And the Emims dwelt there in time past, &c.] A terrible people, as the very name imports, both for their number, and for their strength, being of a large size, like Anakims. (See Gen. xiv. 5.)

Ver. 11. Which also were accounted giants, as the Anakims, &c.] Which seems to have been their name; or else Rephaim: but to distinguish them from others of that name in Canaan, the Moabites called them Emims.

Ver. 12. The Horims also dwelt in Seir before time.] They were the ancient inhabitants of Mount Seir; as the Emims were of the country of Moab, (Gen. xiv. 6. xxxvi. 20.)

But the children of Esau succeeded them.] Planted themselves in that mountain.

When they had destroyed them from before them, and dwelt in their land.] When the children of Esau expelled the Horites, or the children of Lot the Emims, is no where recorded; nor who were their leaders in these expeditions. But they seem to be here remembered, as an encouragement to the Israelites to hope that they might drive out the inhabitants of Canaan (who were not stronger than these), as they had already driven the Amorites out of the country of Sihon, as it here follows.

As Israel did unto the land of his possession, which the Lord gave unto them.] Some have argued from hence, that this book was not written by Moses, but by somebody else, after they had got possession of the land of Canaan. But it is manifest, this may relate to what they had done already in dispossessing Sihon king of the Amorites, and Og king of Bashan, of their country: which, it is expressly said, Moses had given for a possession to the tribe of Reuben and Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh; and that by God's direction, Numb. xxxii. 33. xxxiv. 14, 15. and in this book, xxix. 8. This hath been observed by many; particularly by Huetius, in his Demonstratio Evangelica, propos. iv. cap. 14. n. 15.

Ver. 13. Now rise up, said I, and get you over the brook Zered, &c.] Which elsewhere we translate the valley of Zered. (See Numb. xxi. 12.)

Ver. 14. And the space in which we came from Kadesh-barnea, until we came over the brook Zered, was thirty-eight years.] For it is evident, by the story in Numbers, that they came to Kadesh-barnea about the fourth month of the second year after they came out of Egypt. (See upon Numb. xii. 16.) And if we suppose that they removed from hence in the seventh or eighth month of that year, it is certain that they could not come to this brook till the seventh or eighth month of the fortieth year. For Aaron died at Mount Hor on the first day of the fifth month of this year; and we must allow two or three months time, for all that followed between that and this, viz. the conquest of king Arad, and of Sihon, and Og, &c.

Until all the generation of the men of war.] So they were called, who were above twenty years old, (Numb. i. 3.)

Were wasted out from among the people.] Utterly consumed, so that not one of them was left, (Numb. xxvi. 64, 65.)

As the Lord sware unto them.] See Numb. xiv. 28, 29.

Ver. 15. For indeed the hand of the Lord was against them, to destroy them from among the host.] Some of them, it is likely, died a natural death; but many of them might, in the course of nature, have lived longer, if God had not several ways cut them off before their time.

Until they were consumed.] By one plague or other, which God sent among them: so that a great deal of their time, in the thirty-eight years beforementioned, was spent, it is likely, in burying and mourning for their dead.

Ver. 16, 17. So it came to pass, when all the men of war were consumed and dead from among the people, that the Lord spake unto me, saying.] This was spoken, it is probable, just as they passed over the brook Zered, or in their next station, at Dibon-Gad, (Numb. xxxiii. 45.)

Ver. 18. Thou art to pass through Ar, the coast of Moab, this day.] Or rather, to pass by the border of Moab: for they were not permitted to come into their country, ver. 9. (See upon ver. 4.)

Ver. 19. And when thou comest nigh over against the children of Ammon.] As they did after the conquest of Sihon king of the Amorites; whose country bordered upon the Ammonites, (Numb. xxi. 13. 24.)

Distress them not, neither meddle with them.] The same command with that about the Edomites and Moabites, (ver. 5. 9.)

For I will not give thee of the land of the children of Ammon any possession.] As he had said before of the land of Moab, (ver. 9.)

Digitized by Microsoft®

Because I have given it unto the children of Lot for a possession.] To the descendants of his youngest son; as he had done the country of Moab to the children of the eldest.

Ver. 20. And that also was accounted a land of giants, &c.] Was called the country of giants, or Rephaim: for people so called inhabited it.

And the Ammonites called them Zamzummims.] Changed their names, it is probable, from Zuzims, (see Gen. xiv. 5.) as they were called before, into Zamzummims. But why they were called either by the one name or the other, it is but conjectured. Some conceive they were called Zuzims from their swiftness, or nimble running, which, in warriors, was a quality always highly valued; and Zamzummims from their abominable wickedness, or their craft and cunning in doing mischief.

Ver. 21. A people great, and many, and tall as the Anakims.] The same description which he gave of the Emims, ver. 10.

But the Lord destroyed them before them.] i. e. Before the Ammonites; who expelled them out of their country, and it is like cut off the most of them.

And they succeeded them, and dwelt in their land.] This is so often repeated, to possess the minds of the Israelites with a sense of God's providence, which rules every where; displacing one people, and settling another in their stead; and fixing their bounds also, which they shall not pass without his leave.

Ver. 22. As he did to the children of Esau, which dwelt in Seir, when he destroyed the Horites from before them, &c.] He repeats this (which he had said before, ver. 12.) because it was a fresher instance of God's disposal of countries unto what people he pleases; and nearly touched the Israelites, because they were their brethren.

Ver. 23. And the Avims which dwelt in Hazerim, even unto Azzah.] Unto which he adds an instance, which seems to be elder than any of the former, concerning a people called Avims; who inhabited some part of the land of Canaan, whither they were going. For though we do not read of Hazerim in any other place, yet Azzah, i. e. Gaza, was in the country of the Philistines; who expelled these Avims. And David Chytræus thinks that Hazerim was a town afterward in the tribe of Judah, called Hazagaddah, Josh. xv. 27.

The Caphtorim which came out of Caphtor.] That is, some people of Cappadocia; who were near of kin to the Philistines. (See Gen. x. 14.)

Destroyed them, and dwelt in their stead.] Concerning which, see in the place abovenamed. Unto which I shall only add, that the Avims being expelled out of Canaan by the Caphtorims, went, it is very probable, over Euphrates and settled there; till the king of Assyria brought some of them back again, to plant the country of Samaria; 2 Kings xvii. 31. where we translate this word Avites. (See Bochart, in his Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 36.)

Ver. 24. Rise ye up, take your journey, and pass over the river Arnon.] See Numb. xxi. 13, 14.

Behold, I have given unto thy hand Sihon king of Heshbon, and his land, &c.] You yourselves shall do to him, what your brethren the children of Esau did to the Horites, and the Moabites to the Emims, and the children of Ammon to the Zamzummims, and the Caphtorims to the Avims. By which their faith might still be more confirmed, that the people of Canaan, though never so mighty, should not be able to stand before them.

Ver. 25. This day will I begin to put the dread of thee, and the fear of thee, upon the nations that are under the whole heaven.] Especially upon the Canaanites, who were struck, no doubt, with terror by this conquest, as they had been by all that befel the Egyptians, (Josh. ii. 10, 11.)

Who shall hear the report of thee.] This explains what he means by the hyperbolical expression beforegoing, the nations under the whole heaven; that is, as many as shall hear of these things.

And shall tremble, and be in anguish because of thee.] As women in travail are.

Ver. 26. And I sent messengers out of the wilderness of Kedemoth.] There is a city of this name mentioned by Joshua, xiii. 18. from whence this wilderness had its denomination. Some take it to be the same with that called Jeshimon, Numb. xxi. 20.

Unto Sihon, king of Heshbon, with words of peace.] A friendly message, desiring there might be no quarrel between him and the Israelites, who desired nothing but the common offices of humanity.

Ver. 27. Let me pass through thy land.] Which was the direct way to the fords of Jordan.

I will go along by the highway.] Not turning into the fields or vineyards, as it is expressed Numb. xxi. 22. In the Hebrew the word is doubled, bederech, bederech, by the way, by the way: which seems to be a vehement affirmation, to assure them they would not stir out of the highway.

I will neither turn unto the right hand, nor to the left.] Not step aside out of the common road (called the king's highway), which was free for all people.

Ver. 28. Thou shalt sell me meat for money, that I may eat, &c.] They offered to pay for whatsoever they wanted; which is included in meat and drink.

Only I will pass through on my feet.] Barely have a passage through his country.

Ver. 29. As the children of Esau which dwelt in Seir, and the Moabites which dwelt in Ar, did unto me.] He doth not mean that they granted Israel a passage through their country; but that they did not deny to sell them meat and drink for their money, as they passed by their coasts.

Until I pass over Jordan, unto the land which the Lord our God giveth us.] This was said to move Sihon to consent to their desire, by letting him understand they intended nothing against his country; being secure of a settlement in the land of Canaan, unto which they prayed him to let them pass quietly.

Ver. 30. But Sihon, king of Heshbon, would not let us pass by him.] Refused to agree to this reasonable demand.

For the Lord thy God hardened his spirit, and made his heart obstinate, &c.] Gave him over to his own inflexible humour, which was set upon violent courses; from which God did not divert him (because he intended to destroy him), but rather ordered things so, that his mind should be enraged and disturbed, and so unable to consider things prudently, and discern what belonged to his peace; which is the utmost that can be meant by hardening his spirit, and making his heart obstinate. Which, as it is a sin, cannot be ascribed unto God; but, as it is a punishment, might justly be inflicted by him upon Sihon for his former sins.

Ver. 31. And the Lord said unto me, Behold, I have begun to give Sihon and his land.] This was said when Moses saw him coming out to battle against them (as it here follows in the next verse), at which time he is said to begin to give them his country, because he had absolutely resolved it; and, it is probable, so confounded his forces, that they were as good as already conquered.

Before thee.] Into their power; that they might go into it at their pleasure.

Begin to possess, that thou mayest inherit his land.] In the same sense he bids Moses begin to possess; i. e. prepare to take possession of it. (See iii. 2.)

Ver. 32. Then Sihon came out against us, he and all his people, to fight at Jahaz.] See Numb. xxi. 23.

Ver. 33. And the Lord our God delivered him before us; and we smote him, and his sons, and all his people.] They won the field, and killed him, his sons, and all that came out to fight with them. And R. Solomon saith his sons were like himself, very great men.

Ver. 34. And we took all his cities at that time.] After this victory they took his whole country, as is related Numb. xii. 24, 25. and the cities belonging to it are mentioned xxxii. 34, 35, &c.

And utterly destroyed the men, and the women, and the little ones, of every city; we left none to remain.] They being part of those wicked people the Amorites; whom God had condemned to utter destruction: for the Amorites came out of Canaan, and took this country from the Moabites and the children of Ammon.

Ver. 35. Only the cattle we took for a prey unto ourselves, &c.] They had the Divine warrant for this, no doubt; as they had for the extirpation of the people.

Ver. 36. From Aroer, which is by the brink of the river Arnon.] This river divided Moab from the kingdom of Sihon, (Numb. xxi. 13. 24.) upon which the city of Aroer stood; which was now in the possession of Sihon, though belonging formerly to the Moabites.

And from this city that is by the river.] This some take to be the city Ar, (Numb. xxi. 15.) But I think these words should rather be translated, even the city in the river; meaning Aroer still, as a remarkable place, being encompassed with the river, (Josh. xii. 2.) For Ar, I think, was never in the possession of the Amorites, being the capital city of Moab.

Even unto Gilead.] For half of Gilead belonged to the country of Sihon, (Josh. xii. 2.) and was given to the tribe of Gad, (Josh. xv. 2.) And the other half belonged to the kingdom of Og, (as we read in the same place, Josh. xii. 5.) and was given to the half tribe of Manasseh, (Josh. xiii. 31.)

Ver. 37. Only unto the land of the children of Ammon thou camest not.] That is, into no part of their country, which was then in their possession: but all that the Amorites had taken from them was given to the Gadites, (Josh. xiii. 25.)

Nor unto any place in the river Jabbok.] To no place beyond that river, which was the border of the children of Ammon, (Numb. xxi. 24. Josh. xii. 2.)

Nor into the cities of the mountains.] Much less into the mountainous parts of the country of the Ammonites.

Nor unto whatsoever the Lord our God forbade us.] The words in the Hebrew are, And all whatsoever the Lord our God commanded us, i. e. not to meddle withal.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. THEN we turned, and went up by the way of Bashan; and Og the king of Bashan came out against us, &c.] See Numb. xxi. 33. where there are the very same words.

Ver. 2. And the Lord said unto me, Fear him not: for I will deliver, &c.] The same words in Numb. xxi. 34. Only there he saith, I have delivered him into thy hand; that is, resolved to do it. Which may interpret what is said in the foregoing chapter of this book, ver. 31. concerning Sihon.

Ver. 3. So the Lord our God delivered into our hands Og also, the king of Bashan, &c.] See Numb. xxi. 35.

Ver. 4. And we took all his cities at that time, all the cities, &c. threescore cities.] See upon Numb. xxxii. 41.

All the region of Argob.] A small province lying between Jordan and the mountains of Gilead, a little above the sea of Tiberias: which region was afterward called Trachonitis, from the asperity of the mountains.

The kingdom of Og in Bashan.] Belonging to his kingdom in Bashan, (ver. 13. and 1 Kings iv. 13.)

Ver. 5. All these cities were fenced with high walls, gates, and bars, &c.] So they are described 1 Kings iv. 13.

Ver. 6. And we utterly destroyed them, &c.] For they were Amorites, and therefore under the curse of God; being part of the seven nations of Canaan, devotive to destruction. (See ii. 34.)

Ver. 7. But all the cattle, and the spoil of the cities, we took for a prey to ourselves.] As they had done before, when they destroyed Sihon and his people, (ii. 35.)

Ver. 8. And we took at that time, out of the hand of the two kings of the Amorites, the land which was on this side Jordan.] Which was given to the two tribes of Reuben and Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh, (ver. 12, 13.) If men were not blinded with prejudice, they could not but see from hence, that the word beeber, in the first verse of this book, is rightly translated on this side: for beyond Jordan (as they would have it signify) in the land of Canaan, these two kings had no possessions; nor did Moses make any conquest there.

From the river of Arnon unto Hermon.] This river was the bounds of their country on the south; and Hermon, which was one of the mountains of Gilead (where it joins to Libanus), was their bound on the north.

Ver. 9. Which Hermon the Sidonians call Sirion.] And so it is called in Psal. xxix. 6. and joined with Lebanon: for it was as much a part of Libanus as of Gilead, these two mountains there meeting together. Whence Jeremiah calls Gilead the head of Lebanon, (xxii. 6.) because Libanus begins where Gilead ends.

And the Amorites call it Shenir.] And so it is called Ezek. xxvii. 5. and had this name, as Bochart conjectures, from the multitude of wild cats which were in this mountain: for the Arabians called that creature sinaur or sinar. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 14.)

Ver. 10. All the cities of the plain.] All the flat country which the LXX. thought was called Misor; for they retain here that Hebrew word.

And all Gilead.] i. e. All that part of it which belonged to him; which was but half, as I observed before, ii. 36.

And all Bashan.] That part of his country which was properly and peculiarly called Bashan; which being the most rich and fertile (as the word signifies), gave denomination to his whole kingdom.

Unto Shalchah and Edrei, cities of the kingdom of Og in Bashan.] The former of these is mentioned Josh. xiii. 11. (just as it is here) as the bounds of Bashan towards Mount Hermon, or Lebanon: so Chytræus, "A town in Bashan in the mountains of Libanus near to Machati." And Edrei was the place where they fought with Og, and overthrew him, (Numb. xxi. 23.)

Ver. 11. For only Og king of Bashan remained of the remnant of the giants.] Or of the Rephaim, a very ancient people in that country, (Gen. xiv. 5.) who were either descended from the Amorites, or mingled with them: and Og was the very last of them; so that he and his people being destroyed, none of them remained.

Behold, his bedstead is a bedstead of iron.] Which was no unusual thing in ancient days, though far later than this. For Thucydides saith, that when the Thebans took Plateæ, they made beds of the brass and iron they found there; which they dedicated to Juno. And beds of silver and gold are mentioned by divers authors, as Huetius observes in his Demonstr. Evangel. propos. iv. cap. 14. n. 7.

Is it not in Rabbath of the children of Ammon?] This is thought by some to be a considerable objection against Moses being the author of this book: for how should this bedstead, say they, come to the children of Ammon in his days? No doubt they imagine it would have remained in Bashan whilst Og lived: though, in length of time, it might be carried into the country of the Ammonites: as, if Og, fearing the worst, might not send his bed and his best furniture unto the Ammonites, knowing they would be safe among them, because the Israelites were forbid to make war upon them. Or Moses, having conquered the country, and kept all the spoil, (ver. 7.) might not sell this, among other goods, to the children of Ammon, who preserved it in their capital city. Nobody can see an unreasonableness in either of these suppositions of the same Huetius. Nor do I see how the conjecture of another learned person (Andræas Masius, upon the twelfth of Joshua) can be confuted; which is, that the Ammonites drove out that monstrous sort of people, mentioned ii. 21. Og might possibly escape (and so is said here to be left of the remnant of the giants), who, flying hither to the Amorites, was made their king, because of his goodly presence and great valour. But the Ammonites kept his bedstead, and shewed it as a monument of that illustrious victory which they got over the Rephaim, or as they called them the Zamzummims, in that country.

Nine cubits was the length thereof, and four cubits was the breadth thereof.] This is mentioned, to shew of what a vast stature Og was: for bedsteads being, according to the common custom, made a third part longer than the persons that lie in them, he was six cubits high, as Maimonides computes, that is, as high again as any other man, (More Nevochim, par. ii. cap. 47.) which is very sober discourse, in comparison with what other Jews say of him. (See Schickard, in his Bechinah Happeruschim, p. 120.)

After the cubit of a man.] According to the cubit of ordinary men, saith the same Maimonides (which is a little more than half a yard), not of Og beforementioned. But what need was there, say former objectors, to mention this? since the Israelites saw Og lie dead before them on the ground, and needed not to be told by Moses how tall he was? and therefore they conclude this was written by somebody else, in aftertimes. As if Moses did not write for the benefit of those that come after, as well as for the present generation. Who, that they might be satisfied what a vast man Og was, he left it upon record how large his bedstead was, and where it might be seen; whereby they may judge of his stature. Besides, there were in the present generation great numbers of children, old men, women, and servants, who could not go to see Og lie at length upon the field: but by this means were instructed from what a terrible enemy God had delivered them.

They that question the truth of this relation, may read, if they be able, what the learned Huetius hath at large discoursed concerning men of a portentous bigness in all countries, (in his Quæstiones Alnetanæ, lib. ii. cap. 12. n. 3.) of which no man can doubt, who is not resolved to disbelieve all the world. In his Demonstratio Evangelica also he observes, that Homer makes Tityon, when he was dead, to have lain stretched out upon (not nine cubits, but) nine acres of ground:

——— ἐπ' ἐννέα κεῖτο πέλεθρα.

Which hyperbole may excuse the Jewish rabbins, when they say that Og was nine cubits long when he lay in his cradle. (See propos. iv. cap. 8. n. 4.)

Ver. 12. And this land, which we possessed at that time, from Aroer, which is by the river Arnon.] See ii. 36.

And half Mount Gilead, and the cities thereof, gave I unto the Reubenites, and to the Gadites.] See Numb. xxxii. 34, 35, &c. but especially Josh. xiii. 15, &c. where he distinctly relates what portion of this country was given to the Reubenites; and ver. 23, 24, &c. what was given to the Gadites. And it appears, that none of Gilead belonged to the Reubenites; but the Gadites had one half of it, as the Manassites had the other.

Ver. 13. And the rest of Gilead.] Which was not given to the Gadites.

And all Bashan, being the kingdom of Og.] That is, all that was taken from Og, of which he was king.

Gave I unto the half tribe of Manasseh; all the region of Argob, with all Bashan.] It is repeated again, lest any one should think that Argob, which was a distinct province in that kingdom, was not given to them by this grant. (See ver. 4.)

Which was called the land of giants.] Where the Rephaims formerly inhabited; of whom Og was the last. (See Gen. xiv. 5. compared with xv. 20. Josh. xiii. 12.)

Ver. 14. Jair, the son of Manasseh, took all the country of Argob.] This is one reason why he gave this country to them. (See Numb. xxxii. 41.)

Unto the coasts of Geshuri and Maachathi.] We had no mention of these places before; which were in the northern part of this country, as appears from Josh. xii. 4, 5. xiii. 11. But the people of these places they could not expel, (Josh. xiii. 13.)

And called them after his own name.] Numb. xxxii. 4.

Unto this day.] From hence, likewise, cavils are raised against Moses being the author of this book: when the most that can be concluded from hence is, that, upon the revising of these books by Ezra, he put in these words to certify the reader, that still they retained this name; as somebody, no doubt, added the history of Moses's death at the end of this book. This the greatest defenders of the authority of these books, as written by Moses himself, make no scruple to allow; particularly Huetius, and since him Hermannus Witzius, in his Miscellanea Sacra, lib. i. cap. 14. sect. 47. But there is no necessity to yield so much; for Moses might say this himself, though it was not long before he wrote this book. For so the holy writers do sometimes mention places, which had their name but newly given them, from a particular fact, that posterity might know the original of it. (See Acts i. 19.)

Ver. 15. And I gave Gilead.] All that was not possessed by the Gadites.

Unto Machir.] To the posterity of Machir, (Numb. xxxii. 40.)

Ver. 16. And unto the Reubenites, and unto the Gadites.] Here is a more exact description of that part of the country, which was given to the other two tribes.

I gave from Gilead.] Half of which, as I observed, was given to the Gadites, (ver. 12.)

Even unto the river Arnon.] Which was the bounds of the country towards Moab. (See ii. 36.)

Half the valley.] The same word in the Hebrew language, signifies both a valley, and a brook or river: and being translated in the foregoing words, the river, it should be so here likewise, half the river; that is, to the middle of the river Arnon; by which the bounds of their country are most exactly set. And thus not only the LXX. and the Vulgar, but Onkelos also translates it, the middle of the torrent; yea, we ourselves also in the twelfth of Josh. ii. where there are the same words, which in the Hebrew run thus, unto the river Arnon, the midst of the river: where the city of Aroer stood, encompassed by the river, as I observed in the foregoing chapter, ver. 36.

And the border.] Something is understood, viz. went (as the phrase is Josh. xv. 6, 7, &c.) or reached, or some such word. Or the meaning must be, the country bordering upon that river.

Even unto the river Jabbok, which is the border of the children of Ammon.] This river was the other boundary of the country.

Ver. 17. The plain also, and Jordan.] The flat country towards the river Jordan: which was the western bounds of this country of Sihon; as the river Arnon was the southern, and the river Jabbok the northern; the country of the children of Ammon being on the east.

And the coast thereof, from Cinnereth.] The word thereof is not in the Hebrew: therefore these words may be better rendered the coast from Cinnereth. Called the Sea of Cinnereth, Josh. xii. 3. xiii. 27. it lying upon a country and a city called by that name, (Josh. xi. 2. xix. 35.) which gave the name to this sea, called in the New Testament, the Sea of Galilee, and the Sea of Genesareth, and at last the Sea of Tiberias; in honour of the emperor Tiberius. (See upon Numb. xxxiv. 11.)

Even unto the sea of the plain, even the Salt Sea.] The Dead Sea, as it is called in other places; which, before the burning of Sodom and Gomorrah, had been a most pleasant plain.

Under Ashdoth-Pisgah.] The name of a city in this country, (Josh. xiii. 20.)

Eastward.] Which lay east of the Salt Sea and Jordan; which was the western bounds, as I said, of this country.

Ver. 18. And I commanded you at that time.] That is, he gave this charge to the two tribes of Reuben and Gad, and to the half tribe of Manasseh beforementioned.

The Lord your God hath given you this land to possess it, &c.] According to their own desire: but on condition they should help their brethren to conquer the land of Canaan. (See Numb. xxxii. 20—22.)

Ver. 19. But your wives, and your little ones, and your cattle (for I know you have much cattle), shall abide in your cities which I have given you.] See Numb. xxxii. 16. 24. 26.

Ver. 20. Until the Lord have given rest unto your brethren, as well as unto you, &c.] Brought them to a settlement in the land of Canaan, and given them a peaceable possession of it. After which, we read that Joshua dismissed these tribes, and sent them to their wives and children, Josh. xxii. 4.

Ver. 21. And I commanded Joshua at that time.] About that time, when by God's order he appointed Joshua to be his successor, and took him to be his associate in the government, (Numb. xxvii. 18, &c.)

Thine eyes have seen all that the Lord your God hath done unto these two kings: so shall the Lord do unto all the kingdoms whither thou passest.] This seems to be the preface to the charge, which by God's command he gave to Joshua at that time, (Numb. xxvii. 19. 23.)

Ver. 22. Ye shall not fear them; for the Lord your God fighteth for you.] This is part of the charge itself; which he had heard him give all the people eight-and-thirty years ago, (i. 21. 29, 30.)

Ver. 23. And I besought the Lord at that time, saying.] Being told by God at the same time (Numb. xxvii. 12, 13.) that he should shortly die, and only see the land of Canaan, but not enter into it, Moses made his humble supplication to God that he would not execute the sentence which he had denounced against him. For the word besought signifies supplication to one that is offended.

Ver. 24. O Lord God, thou hast begun to shew thy servant thy greatness, and thy mighty hand.] In subduing the two kings of the Amorites.

For what god is there in heaven, or in earth, that can do according to thy works, and according to thy might?] He speaks according to the language of those times, when men worshipped many gods, of several sorts: none of which, he acknowledges, were able to bring to pass such things as the Lord had done.

Ver. 25. I pray thee let me go over, and see the good land that is beyond Jordan.] To see is here to enjoy it, as the rest of the Israelites were to do: for God bade him go up into a mountain and behold it; but threatened he should not enter into it. Which threatening he might well think was reversible, as others had been against the people of Israel upon his prayer for them, though they had more highly offended the Divine Majesty than he had done. For though he doubted at the first, especially when he saw no water come out of the rock at the first stroke; yet he presently recovered himself, and smote it the second time, believing God would relieve them.

That goodly mountain.] Most think that he desired to go so far into it, as to see the place where God intended to settle his Divine presence: which proved to be Mount Moriah. But nothing was known of this, a long time after; unless we suppose it was revealed unto him, that where Abraham offered Isaac, there the Lord would dwell. It seems to me, that he means that goodly country full of noble mountains: for thus the word mountain is often used, particularly Numb. xiii. 29. where the spies say the "Amorites dwell in the mountain," i. e. in that mountainous part of Canaan.

And Lebanon.] He desired to go through the whole country, as far as Lebanon; which was the most northerly part of it (famous for goodly cedars), as the mountain before spoken of was in the south of Canaan.

Ver. 26. But the Lord was wroth with me for your sakes.] See i. 37.

And would not hear me.] Refused to grant my petition.

And the Lord said unto me, Let it suffice thee; speak no more unto me of this matter.] This suggests that Moses renewed his petition, after the first denial; and more earnestly begged this favour of God: which he could not obtain; but was enjoined silence. This argues great displeasure; and is mentioned by him as an admonition to the Israelites, to be fearful to offend the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 27. Get thee up to the top of Pisgah.] See what I have noted upon Numb. xxvii. 12.

And lift up thine eyes westward, and northward, &c.] Take a full view of the country in all the quarters of it; which might be seen from the top of this mountain, which was called Nebo. (See xxxiv. 1—3.)

Ver. 28. But charge Joshua, and encourage and strengthen him, &c.] Bid him not doubt that I will bring my people thither under his conduct, though I deny thee entrance into it.

Ver. 29. So we abode in the valley over against Beth-Peor.] It is likely that there was a temple built to Baal-Peor, which fronted this valley; for so Beth signifies, a house or temple of Peor. Which gave the name to a city wherein it stood; which was part of the inheritance of the Reubenites, (Josh. xiii. 20.) In this valley Moses was buried, xxxiv. 6. where he made this most excellent exhortation to all the people.

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. NOW therefore hearken, O Israel.] Having commemorated several benefits which God had bestowed upon them, since their coming out of Egypt, and the giving of the law at Mount Sinai, with several severe punishments which he had inflicted on them for their disobedience to it, Moses proceeds now to exhort them earnestly to the observance of it.

Unto the statutes.] These seem to be such laws as concerned the worship of God.

And the judgments.] And then these were such as concerned their dealings one with another. Which two words comprehend all that is signified by testimonies and precepts also, in other places.

Which I teach you, for to do them.] Which he was about to set before them; and press upon their practice.

That ye may live, and go in, and possess the land which the Lord God of your fathers giveth you.] Not perish as their forefathers had done in their rebellion; but be happy, and enjoy what God had promised, and was ready now to bestow upon them.

Ver. 2. Ye shall not add unto the word which I command you, neither shall ye diminish from it.] This is thought by some to signify, that they should not make the least alteration in the laws he had given them, about the rites of Divine worship, and abstinence from several meats, and such-like things; which were distinctive marks, whereby they were separated from other nations to be a peculiar people to him. Thus Chaskuni interprets these words, Thou shalt not add fear, upon the fear of the blessed God. That is, any other worship to the Divine worship prescribed by these laws, nor diminish that worship: which interpretation seems to be warranted, by what follows, Thy eyes have seen what the Lord thy God did, because of Baal-Peor. But in the words beforegoing (which introduce these), judgments being mentioned as well as statutes, there must be a larger sense of this injunction, which relates to all the laws of God: and the meaning seems to be, Ye shall not transgress any of these precepts, either by doing any thing contrary to them, which was to add; or omitting any thing which they required, which was to diminish. Thus Grotius interprets it, upon 2 Cor. xi. 24. "Addere ad legem est facere quod lex vetat, diminuere est omittere quod lex jubet." But which way soever we take it, nothing is more certain than that this prohibition preserved these books from any alteration, since the time they were written: for the whole body of the people acknowledging their Divine authority, none of them dared to change any thing, either by addition or diminution. Of which there is a wonderful instance in the people that came out of Assyria (in the room of the Israelites, who were transported thither), to inhabit the country of Samaria; who receiving this law, their posterity have kept it all along to this day, as uncorrupted, as the Jews themselves have done; although they were their mortal enemies, and have been exposed to all the changes and revolutions that can befal a nation during the interval of two thousand and four hundred years. Thus the most learned Dr. Alix observes, in his Reflections upon the Four last Books of Moses, p. 144. And I do not see, why the perfection of the Scripture, without the oral law of the Jews, should not be thought to be established by these words, as another learned person (J. Wagenseil) understands them, in his Confut. Carminis Lipmanni, p. 585. Yet, as the forenamed Chaskuni notes, it does not seem reasonable to conclude from hence, that they were prohibited to add any constitutions as a hedge and fence to the law; or as an explication of it, when the sense was doubtful. (See Mr. Thorndike, in his Rites of the Church in a Christian State, p. 180, &c.)

That ye may keep the commandments of the Lord your God, which I command you.] This justifies the explication I gave of the foregoing words, as respecting all God's laws; and xii. 32. makes it more plain. And, indeed, God being their lawgiver, it was the highest presumption to make any alteration in any of his laws.

Ver. 3. Your eyes have seen what the Lord did, because of Baal-Peor, &c.] How he cut off twenty-four thousand by a plague, and by the hand of justice, who had been guilty of idolatry by the enticements of the Midianitish women, (Numb. xxv. 5. 9.) Which seems to be a reason, why they should take a special care about the worship of God; that nothing was done contrary to the laws he had ordained concerning it.

For all the men that followed Baal-Peor, the Lord thy God hath destroyed them from among you.] The judges put to death all those that they knew to be guilty; and the hand of God found out all the rest: so that there was not a man of them left, who was not swept away by the pestilence.

Ver. 4. But ye that did cleave unto the Lord.] Did not depart from this worship, but bewailed the apostacy of some of their brethren, (Numb. xxv. 6.)

Are alive every one of you this day.] A singular providence watched over them, to preserve them in such good health, that not one in so many thousands was dead since that time. Nor in the war with the Midianites, wherein they slew all the males, did they lose so much as one man, (Numb. xxxi. 7. 49.)

Ver. 5. Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments.] See ver. 1.

Even as the Lord my God commanded me.] Sincerely and uprightly, without adding any thing of myself, or diminishing any thing that he said.

That ye shall do so in the land whither ye go to possess it.] To be the rule of your life, when ye come into the land of Canaan.

Ver. 6. Keep therefore, and do them; for this is your wisdom and understanding in the sight of all the nations.] It is your interest to observe them, as you will soon find by experience; which will teach you, that it is not only the wisest course in itself, but will get you the reputation of being a wise people among all your neighbours.

Which shall hear of all these statutes.] There being mention before (ver. 1. 5.) of judgments as well as statutes, and here only of the latter, Abarbinel thence infers, That even those laws which depended wholly upon the will and pleasure of God, and for which they could give no reason (for such they understood by chukkim), would procure them very great honour, if they were carefully observed. For the nations seeing how wonderfully they prospered, would be apt to impute it to these extraordinary prescriptions which they followed. Just, saith he, as a physician, who cures desperate diseases, by some small trifling remedies (as they seem to others), is highly applauded for the profoundness of his knowledge and wisdom. But Maimonides takes this word statutes to comprehend all the laws of God; and undertakes to shew, that all the six hundred and thirteen precepts have a wise end in them, for the profit and benefit of those that observe them; either to beget some wholesome opinion in their mind, or to pull out some perverse one; either to institute some good order, or to take away iniquity, &c. (See More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 31.)

And say, Surely this nation is a wise and understanding people.] Who continued in safety, liberty, and prosperity, abounding with all manner of blessings, while they continued all to go up to worship one God sincerely at one place, at certain set times, as if the whole nation was but one family. All the rest of their laws, also, were admirably fitted to unite them unto God, and one to another; and consequently, to make them appear a wise people in the eyes of other nations; whose writers have not only highly magnified Moses, but their lawgivers have transcribed several of his laws into their own constitutions. This appears by the old Attic laws, and those of the twelve tables, as many learned men have observed; nay, the oracle, reported by Porphyry, in Eusebius's Præparatio Evangelica, lib. ix. cap. 10. thus extols this nation:—

Μοῦνοι Χαλδαῖοι σοφίαν λάχον ἠδ' ἄρ' Ἑβραῖοι
Αὐτὸ γένεθλον Ἄνακτα σεβαζόμενοι Θεὸν ἁγνῶς.

The Chaldeans and the Hebrews (who came from Chaldea) are the only wise people, who worship God, the Eternal King, in a pure manner. And the oracle of Apollo Clarius, recorded by Macrobius, lib. i. Saturnal. cap. 18. is no less remarkable:

Φράζεο τῶν πάντων ὕπατον Θεὸν, ἔμμεν Ἰαώ.

Acknowledge Jao (so they pronounced the name Jehovah) to be the highest God of all. For though Macrobius fancied the sun to be here called Ἰαώ, (nobody can tell why); yet Diodorus Siculus acknowledges Ἰαὼ to be the God, from whom Moses pretended to have his laws, i. e. Jehovah.

Ver. 7. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the Lord our God is in all things that we call upon him for?] Both Onkelos, and the paraphrase of Jonathan, and likewise the Jerusalem Targum, are very significant upon this place: "What people is there who have a god that approaches to them, so as the Lord our God doth to us? At whatsoever hour we cry unto him, he answers us. It is the manner of other people, to carry their gods upon their shoulders, to shew that they are near to them; when, alas! they are afar off, and cannot hear them. But the Lord our God sits on his throne on high, and hears our prayers, whatsoever time we call upon him," &c. To which may be added, that they had a symbol of God's presence continually among them, in the holy place, where he dwelt with them, and Moses, whensoever he pleased, consulted him in all difficult affairs; as their high-priest might do, with the urim and thummim, in all times to come.

Ver. 8. And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous, as all this law which I set before you this day?] The true greatness of a nation (it appears by this and the foregoing verse) consists in the sincere worship of God, and in the upright administration of justice. Both which were so provided for by the Divine laws among the Jews, that no nation could compare with them, or was really so great as they were: for, though their country was but small, and they were often oppressed by several cruel enemies, who desired their extirpation, yet they recovered themselves, and kept their laws in their worst condition (when commonly they best observed them): insomuch, that, as a very learned person of our own church long ago observed, after so many changes and alterations as there were in their state, from better to worse, and back again; after so many victories got by them over others, and so many captivities of their persons, and desolations of their country, as others had wrought, they continued still one and the same people, governed by the same laws, under several great and potent monarchies. The successive rise and fall of three, of which they were preserved to behold; and, in their declining state, able to stand out a great while against the fourth, the mightiest that ever was on earth, and that when this monarchy was in its full strength; this is a plain demonstration of the truth of these words of Moses, That no nation was so great as they. (See Dr. Jackson's first book upon the Creed, chap. 21.)

Maimonides observes, that the word zaddikim, which we translate righteous, signifies as much as equal and proportionate: such, saith he, were all these laws of God; in which there was no excess, by the prescription of long pilgrimages, or severe fastings; nor any defect which might open the window to any vice, or make them careless in the practice of virtue. (More Nevochim, par. ii. cap. 39.)

Ver. 9. Only take heed to thyself, and keep thy soul diligently, lest thou forget the things which thou hast seen, &c.] Their only danger was, lest they should grow careless and unmindful of all the wonderful things that God had done for them: which he, therefore, exhorts them to think of frequently, and to keep in memory, and lay to heart; so that they might preserve the sense of them as long as they lived, and likewise teach all posterity to be mindful of them.

Ver. 10. Especially the day that thou stoodest before the Lord thy God in Horeb.] But above all, that memorable day, when the Lord delivered his law to them in Mount Sinai; at which the oldest of them were present, and had seen and heard what he said, and how it was delivered.

When the Lord said unto me, Gather me the people together.] Unto the foot of Mount Sinai; where they stood at such a distance from it as God prescribed, (Exod. xix. 10—13.)

And I will make them hear my words.] See Exod. xix. 9, &c. xx. 1, &c.)

That they may learn to fear me all the days that they shall live upon the earth, &c.] For those words which they heard were pronounced in so terrible a manner, as to make them dread to offend his majesty, and to instruct their children to stand in awe of him.

Ver. 11. And ye came near, and stood under the mountain.] See Exod. xix. 17.

And the mountain burnt with fire.] See Exod. xix. 16. 18.

Into the midst of heaven.] Into the middle of the air, which is frequently called heaven in Scripture; as the fowls of heaven, are the fowls of the air: but whether the fire flamed up precisely into the very midst of the lower region of the air, or only a great height, is not material; either way the expression is proper enough.

Ver. 12. And the Lord spake unto you out of the midst of the fire.] See Exod. xix. 20. xx. 1. 22.

Ye heard the voice of the words.] See Exod. xx. 19.

But saw no similitude.] Though sometimes the Divine Majesty seems to have appeared in a visible shape, (Dan. vii. 9, 10.) yet, when he came to give them his law, he would not appear in the figure of a man, or any other thing, that might seem to represent him to their outward senses, or their imagination: for it had been dangerous then to manifest himself under any resemblance, when he forbade them to make any resemblance of him. They would have thought he forbade them to make any other resemblance, but that wherein he shewed himself to them; in which they would have concluded it was lawful to represent him.

Only ye heard a voice.] From hence some of the Jews would gather, that the people only heard the sound of God's words, when he spake the ten commandments; but not the distinction of the sound, so as to understand the sense of what he said. Thus Maimonides, in his More Nevochim, (par. ii. cap. 32.) Which is manifestly false, as appears from ver. 10. 13. and Exod. xx. 22. For therefore the day wherein he spake to them in Horeb was so remarkable, as never to be forgotten; because he made them hear his words, so that they might learn to fear him, &c. For, though he did not appear in the likeness of any thing to them, yet he vouchsafed to speak to them plainly in their own language, that they might be instructed in their duty; both which was to keep them from idolatry. He did not let them see any shape, that they might not make any image of him, to worship it, or him by it, after the manner of the heathens; but he let them hear his voice, that they might not go and worship any other's gods, which the heathens pretended spake to them.

Ver. 13. And he declared unto you his covenant, which he commanded you to perform, even ten commandments.] These were the principal laws which they covenanted with him to observe, though afterward he added others, after the tenor of which he made a covenant with them, (Exod. xxxiv. 27.)

And he wrote them upon two tables of stone.] See Exod. xxiv. 12. xxxiv. 28.

Ver. 14. And the Lord commanded me, at that time, to teach you statutes and judgments, that ye might do them in the land whither you go over to possess it.] This doth not signify, that they themselves did not hear the ten words from Mount Sinai, but were taught them by Moses (as Maimonides fancies in the forenamed place), for it plainly relates to the rest of the laws, which God immediately after gave him, (Exod. xxi. xxii. xxiii.) It being their own desire, that God would speak to them no more by himself, but communicate the rest of his will by Moses, (Exod. xx. 19.) And accordingly he told the people all the words of the Lord, and all the judgments, which he delivered to him, (Exod. xxiv. 3.)

All this will appear more plainly from the next chapter of this book, ver. 22, &c.

It is a mere imagination of those Jews, who take the statutes and judgments here mentioned for their oral law, as Aben Ezra, R. Solomon, R. Bechai, and others do, upon this place; who say, that when God gave Moses the written law he expounded it to him: which exposition he delivered to Joshua, and he to the seventy elders, &c. so that it came down to them in a successive tradition.

Ver. 15. Take ye therefore good heed to yourselves, (for ye saw no manner of similitude on the day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb out of the midst of the fire.)] He gives them a special caution about this, because the nations of the world were so prone to make images of their gods; which he expressly forbids in the second commandment. Upon this text the present Jews ground the third article of their faith, which is, that God is incorporeal.

Ver. 16. Lest ye corrupt yourselves.] By worshipping any thing but God himself alone. Unto whom they being espoused, the giving Divine worship unto any thing else, was such a corruption as adultery is in a married woman.

And make you a graven image, the similitude of any figure.] See the second commandment, Exod. xx. 3, 4.

The likeness of male or female.] The representation of God in human shape is first forbidden, because it was most common among the heathens. Therefore I cannot think this relates to the Egyptian worship, who honoured oxen as sacred to Osiris, and cows as sacred to Isis. Unto which Mr. Selden thinks the LXX. had respect, when they translated these words, Ὁμοίωμα ἀρσενικοῦ καὶ θηλυκοῦ. (De Diis Syris, Syntag. i. cap. 4.)

Ver. 17. The likeness of any beast that is on the earth, &c.] The word or is to be here supplied, and in all that follows, in this manner: Or the likeness of any beast that is on the earth; or the likeness of any winged fowl that flieth in the air: where col-tzippor canaph, which we translate, any winged fowl, signifies, all birds and insects that fly in the air: for in the shape of such creatures also the heathen represented their gods, or some of their qualities: for not only oxen were sacred to Apis, and rams to Jupiter Ammon, but hawks and eagles, and even beetles, to other deities.

Ver. 18. Or the likeness of any thing that creepeth on the ground.] Nothing was more common among the heathen than the worship of serpents.

Or the likeness of any fish that is in the waters.] The famous Dagon, whom the Philistines worshipped, was a fish with a human face, hands, and feet. Certain it is, the Syrians worshipped a fish, as Cicero tells us, in his third book of the Nature of the Gods, Syri Piscem venerantur; which Mr. Selden thinks relates to the famous goddess Atargatis; which is a word made out of the Hebrew, addir-dag, i. e. magnificent, or potent fish. (See De Diis Syris, Syntag. ii. cap. 2.) The Egyptians were famous in after-times for worshipping all sorts of animals; and if one could find they were so in the days of Moses, it might be assigned as the most probable reason of his cautioning the Israelites against these things so particularly, they being lately come out of Egypt.

Ver. 19. And lest thou lift up thine eyes upon heaven.] From hence, I believe, that common speech among the Arabians was derived, Take heed how thou gazest on the splendour of the stars: which is, in the first century of Arabic proverbs, set forth by Erpenius, (Prov. xxviii.) who saith he knew not what to make of it: but I take it to be a caveat against idolatry, to which the ancient Arabians were addicted.

And when thou seest the sun, and the moon, and the stars, even all the host of heaven.] The most ancient idolatry of all other seems to have been the worship of the sun, and the rest of the heavenly bodies, which began among the Chaldeans: for there is not any god, or goddess, among the ancient gentiles, but hath a respect to the sun, or the moon, as Gisbertus Cuperus hath very plainly demonstrated, in his Harpocrates, p. 87, &c. 108, &c. And a very learned man of our own hath lately said a great deal on the same subject. (See Appendix to the Antiquity of Palmyra, cap. 4. by Mr. A. Seller; and Maimon. More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 30.)

Shouldest be driven to worship them, and serve them.] Drawn in, enticed, and deceived (as Onkelos, and the LXX. translate it), either by the instigation of some evil genius, or admiration of their splendour, or imitation of other nations, or a vain opinion that some divinity inhabits such illustrious bodies, or out of a sense of the benefits mankind receive by them: for the chief philosophers themselves were led by their weak reasonings into this error, as appears even by Plato, who saith, it is most just that the heaven should be worshipped with all the gods and demons, and that we should Τιμᾶν τε καὶ εὔχεσθαι διαφερόντως αὐτῷ, &c. as he speaks in his Epinomis. See Eusebius, in his Præpar. Evang. lib. xiii. cap. 18. where he shews how much better the Hebrews speak in this matter; and quotes some words of Plato, out of a work of his, not now extant, for the explication of these words of Moses. And, to make this idolatry seem more reasonable, some of the philosophers asserted the sun to be endued with understanding; and, therefore, is called by Proclus, Πυρὸς νοητοῦ βασιλεὺς, the intellectual fire, to distinguish it from other fires which are without understanding: and from thence, in one of the coins of Caracalla, there is over the sun, surrounded with rays, the word Providentia. In short, the world had been so long settled in this worship, that it was no easy matter, when the Son of God came, to root it out: for the Essenes (the best sect among the Jews) seem to have had a tang of this superstition, as Josephus represents them, lib. ii. De Bello Judaico, cap. 7. Some, indeed, excuse them, as if they only admired the sun as the most excellent work of God, which they expressed by some kind of adoration: but Josephus expressly tells us, that, early in the morning, they directed to him Πατρίους τινὰς εὐχὰς, as if they beseeched him to rise. And this stuck still in the minds of some who professed Christianity, particularly the followers of Basilides, and the Manichees, who called the sun and moon by the name of gods; and sometimes called the sun Christ, as Theodoret tells us, lib. i. cap. 26. And Epiphanius and St. Austin say the same in more places than one. No wonder, therefore, that Julian the apostate should say, that God produced, Ἐξ ἑαυτοῦ Ἥλιον Θεὸν μέγιστον πάντα ὅμοιον ἑαυτῷ, out of himself the sun, the greatest god, in all things like unto himself: for which he quotes Plato, in his famous oration in Praise of the Sun; where he saith, The same sun hath filled the heaven with innumerable other gods, p. 146. Ὅλος οὐρανὸς Θεῶν ἐστιν ἐξ ἡλίου πλήρης, The whole heaven is full of gods from the sun.

Which the Lord thy God hath divided unto all nations under the whole heaven.] The sense is very plain, that all nations under heaven have the benefit of the sun, moon, and stars, as well as the Jews; who were therefore to worship him alone, who is the Lord of them all, and hath made them to be ministers unto us.

This K. Solomon saw, and yet he could not stick to it, but fell into the vain fancy of the generality of the Jews, that God hath distributed the nations of the world under the government of several stars, which stars are under the government of angels; but the Jews under the government of God alone, and not subject to any planet. Which hath no foundation at all; much less can we think that God appointed the nations of the world to worship the heavenly host, lest they should be atheists, as Clemens Alexandrinus and Justin Martyr fancy from this place; unless they mean, that God for their sins delivered them up to this impiety; which several great men since have thought to be the true meaning of these words: for there are no such words found in the LXX. as they allege, Ὑμῖν δ' οὐκ οὕτως ἔδωκε Κύριος ὁ Θεός σου.

There is one who takes the word chalak, which we translate divide, to signify the blandish, and makes this the sense, that God places these great luminaries in the heavens, to invite and allure all nations to admire and adore him, the creator of them. And, indeed, in the conjugation which the Hebrews call hiphil, this word doth signify to soften and smooth, and consequently to allure; but it never signifies so in that they call kall.

Maimonides makes the sense of Moses's argument to be thus: God hath made the sun and moon to be ministers; not to be worshipped; according to that, Gen. i. 18. Which made the Psalmist so particularly call upon all the heavenly bodies to praise the Lord, Psal. cxlviii. (More Nevoch. par. ii. cap. 5.)

Ver. 20. But the Lord hath taken you, and brought you forth out of the iron furnace.] This is a phrase used also by Solomon, 1 Kings vii. 51. and by Jeremiah, xi. 4. to express the most cruel servitude; wherein God suffered them to be tried, as metals are in a furnace of iron, red hot; for he doth not allude to their making of bricks (as some imagine), which were not wrought in an iron furnace.

To be unto him a people of inheritance, as ye are at this day.] These were two powerful arguments to induce them to be obedient: that they were not only delivered from the hardest slavery, but now made God's peculiar people, (see Exod. xix. 5.) whom he had purchased for his inheritance, i. e. to be his people for ever.

From this verse Sir John Marsham gathers, that Moses had respect, in the foregoing verses, to the Egyptian superstition; as if he had said, "Excusso servitutis jugo, etiam excutienda sunt Ægypti Βδελύγματα;" having shaken off the Egyptian yoke, they were also to shake off their abominable idols: for the invisible God is not to be worshipped by images or symbols. So that when he forbids them, ver. 16. "to make a graven image, the similitude of any figure, the likeness of male and female," he thinks Moses hath respect to the "boves utriusque sexus sacri," the sacred beeves of both kinds; the males to Osiris, the females to Isis. And he mentions "the likeness of any beast that is in earth," ver. 17. because all the Egyptians worshipped not only the creatures beforementioned, but canem and felem, a dog and a cat: the Thebans and Saitæ worshipped sheep; the Mendesians a goat; and others of them, wolves and lions: and he adds "the likeness of any winged fowl that flieth in the air," because the Egyptians worshipped a hawk, and the bird called ibis; and the Thebans an eagle. In ver. 18. he mentions "the similitude of any thing that creepeth upon the ground;" because about Thebes, serpents were sacred to Jupiter: "and the likeness of any fish that is in the waters," because all Egypt worshipped certain fishes, and some of them the crocodile and the hippopotamus. And as for the sun, moon, and stars, (ver. 19.) the worship of them was common to the Egyptians with all other nations. All this he justifies out of good authors; and it might pass for truth, had we any certainty that the Egyptians in the time of Moses were as sottish as they were in the time of Herodotus. (See Seculum ix. Sect. de Idololatria.)

Ver. 21. Furthermore.] Or rather, but.

The Lord was angry with me for your sakes.] He remembers this again, (though he had mentioned it twice before, i. 37. iii. 26.) that they might be more deeply sensible of the danger of offending God, since such a man as he was excluded from the good land for one single fault. Or hereby he would magnify the goodness of God to them, who, though great offenders, had a privilege granted to them which was denied him.

And sware that I should not go over Jordan, &c.] He only told him so at the first, (Numb. xx. 12.) but upon Moses's importunate entreaty, that he would revoke the sentence (of which we read in the foregoing chapter of this book), it seems he silenced him, by confirming his threatening with an oath.

Ver. 22. But I must die in this land, I must not go over Jordan.] See Numb. xxvii. 12—14. His frequent repetition of this, shews how near it went to his heart. "But ye shall go over, and possess that good land." God's promise to them, he would have them think, was as irrevocable as his threatening against him.

Ver. 23. Take heed unto yourselves, lest ye forget the covenant of the Lord your God, which he made with you, and make you a graven image, &c.] For this was the principal thing in the covenant, that they should worship him alone. Which is the reason it is so often repeated, and was, immediately after the delivery of the law from Mount Sinai, mentioned alone, as if it was the only thing that he had said unto them: (Exod. xx. 22, 23.) "Ye have not seen that I have talked with you from heaven: ye shall not make with me gods of silver; neither shall ye make unto you gods of gold."

Ver. 24. For the Lord thy God is a consuming fire.] So he appeared upon the mount, when he delivered his laws from thence in a flaming fire, (Exod. xxiv. 17.) The learned Huetius thinks, that from these words of Moses, the ancient Persians took up the worship of fire; at first, only as a resemblance of God, or a symbol of him, (as Maximus Tyrius saith, Dissert. xviii.) but afterward, as God himself, (Demonstr. Evangel. p. 94.)

Even a jealous God.] Who cannot endure any rival in your affection: (see Exod. xx. 5.) These were two awakening arguments to keep them from idolatry; that God cannot endure it, and will be very terrible in his punishment of it.

Ver. 25. When thou shalt beget children, and children's children, and ye shall have remained long in the land.] When they were very much multiplied, and had been long settled in the possession of the land of Canaan.

And shall corrupt yourselves.] By the worship of other gods.

And make a graven image, or the likeness of any thing.] Which he had strictly prohibited, and solemnly cautioned them to beware of, ver. 23.

And shall do evil in the sight of the Lord thy God, to provoke him to anger.] By imitating the idolatrous customs of other nations.

Ver. 26. I call heaven and earth to witness against you this day.] A solemn kind of asseveration; that, as surely as the heaven and earth shall endure, they should utterly perish.

That ye shall soon utterly perish from off this land, whereunto ye go, &c.] As soon as the measure of your iniquity is filled up, ye shall speedily be destroyed without remedy. Which the Hebrews refer to the captivity by Salmanezer and Nebuchadnezzar, after they had been almost eight hundred years in this country; and so might be said, to have remained long in the land.

Ver. 27. And the Lord shall scatter you among the nations.] See Levit. xxvi. 33.

And ye shall be left few in number among the heathen, &c.] See Levit. xxvi. 22.

Ver. 28. And there ye shall serve gods, the work of men's hands, wood and stone, &c.] The idols of the heathen: to the worship of which he threatens to abandon them, as a punishment for their apostacy from God. And the heathen sometime compelled them to worship their gods, as we read in the third of Daniel.

Which neither see, nor hear, nor eat, nor smell.] This is a description of the most stupid idolatry, to which they should be delivered, if they fell from God. (See Numb. xxi. 29.)

Ver. 29. But if from thence thou shalt seek the Lord thy God.] When they were scattered among the heathen, (ver. 27.)

Thou shalt find him, if thou seek him with all thy heart, and all thy soul.] If they then repented sincerely, and became unfeigned worshippers of the Lord their God alone, he promises them forgiveness.

Ver. 30. When thou art in tribulation, and all these things are come upon thee.] In great distress, by the execution of the foregoing threatenings.

Even in the latter days.] In future times, or in their most declining state. The Jews themselves apply to this present state, wherein they now, and have been many years; as appears by the ancient Nitzacon, set forth lately by Wagenseil, p. 254. where he saith, the whole nation must repent, before God send deliverance unto them.

If thou turn to the Lord thy God, and shall be obedient to his voice.] The great end of punishment was to convert them, and make them more observant of God's commands.

Ver. 31. For the Lord thy God is a merciful God.] See Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7. Numb. xiv. 17, 18.

He will not forsake thee, neither destroy thee, &c.] He promises not to cast them off, nor destroy them utterly, (though they were utterly thrown out of their land, ver. 26.) but restore them to his favour, according to the covenant made with their fathers, and confirmed by an oath, Gen. xvii. 19. xxii. 16, 17. (See Levit. xxvi. 44, 45.)

Ver. 32. For ask now of the days that are past, which were before thee, since the days that God created man upon the earth, &c.] Turn over the annals of the whole world, from one end of it to the other, ever since it was made, and search whether thou canst find any thing like to that which God hath done for you. Which R. Isaac thus glosses in his Munimen Fidei, (lately set forth by Wagenseil, p. 103.) "From the creation of the world, till their going out of Egypt, there were passed two thousand four hundred and forty-eight years; and yet in all that long track of time, there never were seen or heard in any part of the world such prodigious miracles as were wrought to bring them out of Egypt; and afterward, in leading them through the Red Sea; raining manna on them; and the appearance of the Divine Majesty at Mount Sinai," &c.

Ver. 33. Did ever people hear the voice of God speaking out of the midst of fire, as thou hast heard, and live?] Here was a double, or rather triple prodigy, never heard of before, that God should speak to them, audibly and distinctly, so long as to inform them in their duty towards himself and one another; and this out of the midst of devouring flames, and without the least hurt to any one of them, (Exod. xx. 18. xxiv. 17.)

Ver. 34. Or hath God assayed to go and take him a nation from the midst of another nation?] Another wonder, never before heard of: that God, by two men alone, Moses and Aaron, should demand the delivery of a nation, under the power of another nation far greater and stronger than themselves, and effect it also, by no other means but such as here follow.

By temptations.] This word may be thought to signify the grievous trials of the Israelites, whose miseries were increased after the first attempt for their deliverance; which seemed to them a strange way of proceeding, (Exod. v. 19. 22, 23.) But by temptations may, in this place, be, in general, meant miracles, as the Hebrews understand it, and the Chaldee word tenessin signifies: this and the two following words being of the very same import with the three words in the New Testament, which we often meet withal (and seem to be taken from hence), Δυνάμεσι, τέρασι, καὶ σημείοις, with miracles, wonders, and signs, (Acts ii. 22. 2 Cor. xii. Heb. ii. 4.)

By signs.] Which are mentioned Exod. iv. 9. vii. 9, 10.

And by wonders.] This signifies all the ten plagues of Egypt: for Pharaoh would not let the Israelites go, till God had multiplied his wonders on the land of Egypt, as we read, Exod. vii. 3. x. 1, 2. xi. 9, 10.

And by war.] This seems to relate to the overthrow of Pharaoh in the Red Sea; where the Lord is said to fight for Israel, (Exod. xiv. 14. xv. 3.) while they, which is the greatest wonder of all, were delivered without striking a stroke.

And by a mighty hand, and a stretched-out arm.] These are phrases which we often meet withal, when Moses speaks of their deliverance out of Egypt, Exod. iii. 19. vi. 6. xv. 12. and many other places. And the Hebrews think, that his mighty hand particularly refers to the grievous murrain, and the pestilence, which are called the hand of the Lord, Exod. x. 3. 15. And his stretched-out arm, to have a particular respect to the killing of the first-born; the angel that was going to smite Jerusalem appearing with a "drawn sword, and his hand stretched out," (1 Chron. xxi. 16.)

And by great terrors.] Wherewith the minds of those were struck who heard of these things, (Exod. xv. 14—16.) Or else he means the frights in which the Egyptians were, while they remained three days in most dismal darkness; (Exod. x. 23.) for the conclusion of this verse signifies, that he speaks of all that the Lord their God did for them in Egypt before their eyes.

Ver. 35. Unto thee it was shewed.] This was a particular kindness to the Israelites, which God never before manifested to any other nation.

That thou mightest know that the Lord he is God; there is none else besides him.] That they might believe him to be the only true God, and worship none but him. Which two articles, saith Maimonides, (More Nevochim, par. ii. cap. 33.) that God is, and that he is but one, are fundamentals of religion, which were known not only by prophets, but by every body else.

Ver. 36. Out of heaven he made thee to hear his voice.] See Exod. xx. 22.

That he might instruct thee.] Teach them his will, which was chiefly declared in the ten commandments.

And upon earth he shewed thee his great fire.] He means either that they saw it as they stood upon the earth; or, that it burnt upon the top of the mount in their sight. (Exod. xxiv. 17.)

And thou heardest his words out of the midst of the fire.] See ver. 11, 12. and Exod. xx: 18, 19.

Ver. 37. And because he loved thy fathers, therefore he chose their seed after them.] See Gen. xv. 5—7. and many other places in that book, Exod. iii. 15—17.

And brought them out in his sight with a mighty power.] For, as he led them the way out of Egypt in a pillar of cloud, and of fire, (Exod. xiii. 21.) so, when they were in danger by Pharaoh's pursuit of them, he came behind them, and they marched in his sight, (Exod. xiv. 19.)

Out of Egypt.] This is mentioned in Scripture as the highest benefit, never to be forgotten by them. So G. Schickard observes, in his Mischpat Hammelech: (cap. iii. Theor. 10.) That they are put in mind of this in the frontispiece of the decalogue, (Exod. xx. 2.) in the institution of sacrifices, (Levit. xxii. 33.) in the promise of a blessing, (xxvi. 13.) and here, in the enumeration of God's wonderful works; and afterward in the commendation of his love, (Deut. vii. 8.) in his dehortation from ingratitude, (viii. 14.) in his institution of the Passover, (xvi. 6.) in the speech which the reproving angel made to them, (Judges ii. 1.) in the hope he gave them of victory over the Midianites, (vi. 9.) in his answer to their petition for a king, (1 Sam. x. 18.) and on a great many other occasions: for this was, "velut fundamentum et initium reipublicæ," &c. as another learned German speaks, (Gierus on Dan. ix. 15.) the foundation, as we may call it, and the beginning of their commonwealth founded by God; which comprehended in it abundance of miracles, far exceeding all the power of nature.

Ver. 38. To drive out nations before thee, greater and mightier than thou art.] So mighty, that they frighted their fathers from attempting the conquest of them, (Numb. xiii. 28, 29. 31.)

To bring thee in, to give thee their land for an inheritance, as it is this day.] That is, as he had given them a late experiment, by overthrowing the two kings of the Amorites, and giving them their land for a possession.

Ver. 39. Know therefore this day, and consider it in thy heart, that the Lord he is God in heaven above, and upon the earth, and there is none else.] Be sensible, therefore, and settle this belief in thy heart, that the Lord is the sole governor of the whole world.

Ver. 40. Thou shalt therefore keep his statutes and his commandments, which I command thee this day, &c.] Worship and obey him, as the only way to make them and their posterity live happily in the land, which God was about to give them.

That it may be well with thee, and with thy children after thee, and that thou mayest prolong thy days upon the earth, &c.] Though Moses spake of their long life upon earth, yet the better sort of Jews did not set up their rest here; but from this word prolong, extended their hope as far as the other world: for thus Maimonides saith (in his preface to Pereck Cheleck) they were taught by tradition to expound these words, That it may be well with thee in the world, which is all good; and mayest prolong thy days in the world, which is all long, i. e. never ends.

Ver. 41. Then Moses severed three cities.] I observed in the preface to this book, that Moses did not deliver all that is contained in this book in one continued speech; but at several times, as appears even by the beginning of the next chapter, where it is said, "He called all Israel, and said unto them," &c. Which supposes, that after this preface in these four chapters, he dismissed them to consider what he had said; and then some time after assembled the people again, to put them in mind of the laws which he so earnestly pressed them to observe. But between these two times (after he had spoken all that is contained in these four chapters, and before he rehearsed the decalogue), he put in execution the command of God lately given, to set apart three cities of refuge on this side Jordan; which he here relates, in the order, I suppose, wherein it was done.

On this side Jordan, towards the sun-rising.] On the east side of Jordan, according to what was ordered, Numb. xxxv. 14.

Ver. 42. That the slayer might flee thither, which should kill his neighbour unawares, &c.] See there, ver. 11, 12, &c.

Ver. 43. Namely, Bezer in the wilderness, in the plain country of the Reubenites; and Ramoth in Gilead of the Gadites; and Golan in Bashan of the Manassites.] Thus they are set down also in the book of Joshua, xx. 8. xxi. 27. 36. 38.

Ver. 44. And this is the law which Moses set before the children of Israel.] Now follows the law, which (after the forementioned assignation of the cities of refuge) Moses set before all the people, and pressed them to the observance of it.

Ver. 45. These are the testimonies, and the statutes, and the judgments.] As the next chapter contains the law, that is, the ten commandments, which Moses set before them; so, in several following chapters (after new earnest exhortations to obedience), he represents to them the rest of God's will, comprehended under these three words, testimonies, statutes, and judgments: some of which belong to the Divine service, others to their civil government, and the rest to ceremonial observations, for the better security and preservation of both the former.

Which Moses spake unto the children of Israel, after they came forth out of Egypt.] Which he had formerly delivered to them, after they were come out of the Egyptian bondage, Exod. xxi. xxii. xxiii. and in the following books.

Ver. 46. On this side Jordan, &c.] In this and the two following verses he again mentions the place and the time, when and where, he set before them the law, and the testimonies, statutes, and judgments, recorded in the following part of this book: which he repeats, that all posterity might observe the discourses were made a little before he died.

In the land of Sihon, king of the Amorites, who dwelt at Heshbon.] See chap. ii. 24. 31, &c.

Whom Moses and the children of Israel smote, after they were come forth out of Egypt.] In the fortieth year after their departure thence; as appears from Numb. xxi. 24. xxxiii. 38.

Ver. 47. And they possessed his land, and the land of Og king of Bashan, &c.] See Numb. xxi. 33, &c.

Ver. 48. From Aroer, which is by the bank of the river Arnon, even unto Mount Sihon, which is Hermon.] The mount here called Sihon is not that which was so famous in aftertimes, when David made it the royal seat; for that was on the other side Jordan, and is written with different letters in the Hebrew; but, in all probability, is a contraction of Sirion; which is the name by which the Sidonians called Hermon: for the bounds of this country are so described, (iii. 8, 9. 12.) to extend from the river Arnon to Mount Hermon, which is called Sirion.

Ver. 49. And all the plain on this side Jordan eastward, even unto the sea of the plain.] See chap. iii. 17.

Under the springs of Pisgah.] The same place there called Ashdoth-Pisgah. Which is exactly described after the same manner, by Benjamin Tudelensis, in his Itinerary, set forth by L'Empereur, p. 51. where he saith, that Jordan is called at Tiberias the Sea of Genesareth; and, coming from thence with a great force, falls at the foot of this hill into the Sea of Sodom, which is called the Salt Sea.

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1. AND Moses called all Israel, and said unto them.] That is, summoned all the elders, and heads of their tribes, who were to communicate what he said to the rest: thus it is commonly expounded. But that which he saith, xxix. 10, 11. seems to direct us to another interpretation; that he himself went from tribe to tribe, and repeated these ten words (as they are called), placing himself in several parts of their camp, that every one might hear what he said. And this was sometime after he had, in like manner, exhorted them to obedience in the foregoing preface. (See iv. 41.)

Hear, O Israel, the statutes and judgments which I speak in your ears this day.] Mind what I now say unto you.

That ye may learn them, and keep and do them.] That ye may not be ignorant of such important truths, nor negligent in the practice of them; which is the end of knowledge.

Ver. 2. The Lord our God made a covenant with us in Horeb.] See Exod. xxiv. 3. 5—8.

Ver. 3. The Lord made not this covenant with our fathers.] viz. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; with whom he covenanted to give their posterity the land of Canaan; but did not make to them this discovery of his will, which was the matter of the covenant at Horeb.

But with us, even us, who are all here alive this day.] A great part of those who were then at Horeb were now alive; viz. all under twenty years old. And if they had been all dead, Moses might have said, He made it with us; because they were still the same people, though the particular persons were dead, with whom the covenant was made, not only for themselves, but for their posterity.

Ver. 4. The Lord talked with you face to face in the mount, &c.] Openly, clearly, and distinctly; or by himself, without the mediation of Moses; but in no visible shape: for that is expressly denied in the foregoing chapter, iv. 12. 15.

Ver. 5. I stood between the Lord and you at that time, to shew you the word of the Lord.] As a mediator, whom God employed to prepare them to meet him, (Exod. xix. 10, 11, &c.) and to prescribe them the bounds, at what distance they should keep, (ver. 12.) and to bring them forth to meet with him, (ver. 17.) and to charge them to keep within their bounds, (ver. 21.) And, on the other side, to represent their desires unto God, after he had spoken to them, (Exod. xx. 19.) So that he was truly a mediator between God and them; and stood also in a middle place, at the foot of the mount, while they stood further off.

For ye were afraid by reason of the fire.] Exod. xx. 18.

And went not up into the mount.] Exod. xix. 17. xx. 21.

Ver. 6. I am the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage.] This preface to the ten commandments is explained, Exod. xx. 2.

Ver. 7. Thou shalt have none other gods before me.] See Exod. xx. 3. It is wisely observed by Grotius, (lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 20. sect. 45.) that true religion was ever built upon these four principles: First, that there is a God, and that he is but One. Secondly, that God is nothing of those things that we see with our eyes, but something more sublime than them all. Thirdly, that he takes care of human affairs, and judges them most justly. Fourthly, that he is the maker of all things whatsoever. Which principles are explained in these first four precepts of the decalogue; the unity of the Godhead being delivered in the first place.

Ver. 8—10. Thou shalt not make thee any graven image, nor the likeness of any thing, &c.] The second principle, that God's nature is invisible, is contained in this second commandment; being the ground of this prohibition, to make any image of him: which the best of the heathen forbade also for this very reason, Ὡς οὐκ ἐφάπτεσθαι Θεοῦ δυνατὸν ἄλλως ἢ νοήσει, because it is impossible to conceive God otherwise, but by the mind alone, as Plutarch reports the sense of Numa among the Romans. And we find the same as plainly said by Antisthenes among the Greeks, in Clemens Alexandrinus, Ὀφθαλμοῖς οὐχ' ὁρᾶται, οὐδενὶ ἔοικε, διόπερ αὐτὸν οὐδεὶς δύναται ἐκμαθεῖν ἐξ εἰκόνος: he is not seen by the eyes, nor is like to any thing; and therefore none can learn any thing of him by an image. Nor could the vulgar, I am apt to think, have been kept so long, and so generally as they were, to the worship of them, if it had not been by bold fictions, that some of them were Διοπετῆ, fallen down from heaven; and that all of them were Θεῖα, καὶ θείας μετουσίας ἀνάπλεα, Divine things, and full of a Divine communication, as Jamblichus speaks. And, to make them more reverenced, while some of them were Ἐμφανῆ, conspicuous to all the people, others were kept secret in the inmost part of their temple, as having hidden in them a symbolical presence of God, as Proclus speaks upon Timæus. Which Ezek. Spanhemius justly thinks was done in imitation of what Moses saith concerning God's presence upon the mercy-seat in the holy of holies. (Observationes in Callimachum, p. 586, &c.)

See upon these three verses my annotations on Exod. xx. 4—6.

Ver. 11. Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain, &c.] This contains the third principle beforementioned, that God takes notice of all things, even of our thoughts, and governs all our affairs: for it is the foundation of an oath, that God knows our very hearts, and is witness to our meaning, as well as our words; and will, if we swear falsely, punish us for it: which is an acknowledgment also both of the justice and the power of God. (See upon Exod. xx. 7.)

Ver. 12. Keep the sabbath-day to sanctify it.] They were to keep it in memory, that they might sanctify it, as it is Exod. xx. 8. (See there.) And it was sanctified, or set apart for special ends and purposes, that they might give to the blessed God the seventh part of the week (as Abarbinel speaks upon these words), and might learn the Divine law, together with the Kabalah, or traditional exposition of the words, and mark well the niceties of it: for which he quotes a saying out of the Gemara of the Jerusalem Talmud, "Sabbaths and feasts were not given, but to learn the law upon them." Which is the reason, he saith, of another speech of theirs, in their Midrasch, or allegorical exposition upon Exodus, that "the sabbath weigheth against all the commandments;" because it was a principal means to make them known and observed. There is not much said, indeed, in express words, concerning this end of the rest of the sabbath: but common reason told the Jews, it could not be intended merely as a day of ease from labour, but for the solemn service of God, and instruction in their duty to him.

As the Lord thy God commanded thee.] At Marah, say the Jews commonly, where he gave them a statute and an ordinance. (See Exod. xv. 25.) But one of them saith better, At Marah it was designed, and at Sinai it was commanded. But they do not look back far enough for the original of this commandment: for there being two things in this day, the rest of it, and the religion; the rest of it was in remembrance of their deliverance out of Egypt, and the overthrow of Pharaoh in the Red Sea, which completed their deliverance; immediately after which they kept their first sabbatical rest. The religion was in remembrance of the creation of the world; and so this day had been observed from the beginning by the patriarchs, though we find no mention made of their resting: and that may possibly be the meaning of these words, as the Lord thy God commanded thee; that is, immediately after he had finished the creation of the world.

Ver. 13. Six days shalt thou labour, and do all thy work.] See upon Exod. xx. 9.

Ver. 14. But the seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, &c.] The reason why they might not do any work on this day, is given in Exod. xx. 11. which is wholly omitted here; because Moses had another reason to add, for the enforcement of this precept: and refers them (in the foregoing words, ver. 12. As the Lord thy God hath commanded thee) to what he had said in the books of Genesis and Exodus: where he had set down the reason which God himself gave with his own mouth, for the religious observation of this day; because in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, &c. So that this commandment was designed to establish the fourth principle I mentioned, that God is the maker of all things. To preserve the memory and sense of which (as the author of the answer, Ad Orthodoxos, observes, lxix.) this rest was instituted, to be observed with a more than ordinary sanctity; it being of such great moment, that the first sabbath-breaker was punished with death, because the voluntary violation of it contained in it a denial, that the world was created by God.

That thy man-servant and thy maid-servant may rest as well as thou.] Mercy towards men, as well as piety towards God, was a reason for the observation of the sabbatical rest.

Ver. 15. And remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the Lord thy God brought thee from thence, &c. therefore the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the sabbath-day.] This is a new ground for the observation of the sabbath; because God had given them rest from their hard labour in Egypt. Which obliged them to keep that seventh day, which God appointed at the giving of manna (being the day on which he overthrew Pharaoh in the Red Sea), as the memory of the creation of the world obliged them to keep one day in seven. So our Mr. Mede hath explained it. (See my annotations on Exod. xiv. 30.) And Maimonides hath something to the same purpose, in his More Nevochim, par. ii. cap. 31. (See upon Exod. xx. 11.)

Ver. 16. Honour thy father and thy mother, as the Lord thy God hath commanded thee.] In the twentieth of Exodus, ver. 12. see there. To which I shall here add, that the laws of Solon made those children infamous, who did not afford sustenance to their parents, and provide them a habitation. And by the ancient law of Athens, he that reproached his parents was disinherited; if he struck them, his hand was cut off; if he left them unburied, he lost their estate, and was banished his country: and another law punished this ingratitude with death. See J. Meursius, in his Themis Attica, lib. i. cap. 2, 3. where he shews, that by parents they understood not only father and mother, but grandfather and grandmother; nay, Τούτων μήτηρ καὶ πατὴρ ἐὰν ἔτι ζῶσι, i. e. great-grandmother and great-grandfather, if they were yet alive, as Isæus tells us, Orat. vii. And the ground of all these laws, was a sense they had, as Æschines tells us, That men ought to honour their parents, as they did the gods, Οὓς ἐξ ἴσου δεῖ τιμᾶν τοῖς θεοῖς. (See Sam. Petitus, in Leges Atticas, lib. iii. tit. 3.) Whence Hierocles calls parents, Θεοὶ ἐπίγειοι, earthly gods. And Philo, upon the decalogue, Θεοὶ ἐμφανεῖς, &c. visible gods, who imitate him that is unbegotten, by giving life. And accordingly, next to the precepts concerning the worship of God, Moses here places immediately the duty owing unto parents.

That thy days may be prolonged, and that it may go well with thee, &c.] These last words are added to what God spake, Exod. xx. 12. as an explication of the foregoing. Whereby they are excited to obedience, by the promise not only of a long life, but of a happy. I say obedience; for that is included in honour, as the apostle explains it, Coloss. iii. 20. "Children obey your parents in all things;" that is, where God hath not commanded the contrary, and where it is not inconsistent with the public good; which is alway to be preferred, even before the duty that is owing to natural parents. Insomuch, that common reason taught the heathen, that for the good of the society, the son is to lay aside the reverence he should pay to his father, and the father to pay it unto the son, that is, when he is in public office: thus the famous Fabius Cunctator commended his son, for making him light off from his horse, when he met him in his consulship, as Plutarch tells us. And see A. Gellius, lib. xi. Noct. Attic. cap. 1. and lib. xiii. cap. ult. and lib. xiv. in the beginning.

Ver. 17. Thou shalt not kill.] If a man killed another involuntarily, he was banished by the laws of Athens from his country for a year: but if he killed another ἐκ προνοίας, as Demosthenes speaks, out of forethought, and designedly, he was put to death: (see Sam. Petitus, lib. vii. in Leges Atticas, tit. 1. p. 508. 512.) Yea, so detestable was this sin accounted, that even τὰ ἄψυχα, lifeless things, such as wood, or stone, or iron, wherewith a man was killed, Draco ordered to be thrown out of their coasts. (Ib. p. 523.)

Ver. 18. Thou shalt not commit adultery.] This crime was also punished with death by the laws of Draco. Solon, indeed, left it to the liberty of the husband, who caught another man in bed with his wife, either to kill him, if he pleased, or to let him redeem his life with a sum of money. But if after this he lived with his wife, he was infamous, as Demosthenes tells us, who saith, she might not come publicly into their temples: if she did, any man might treat her as he pleased, only not kill her: so that she was so odious as to be thrown, Ἔκ τε τῆς οἰκίας τοῦ ἀνδρὸς, καὶ ἐξ ἱερῶν τῶν τῆς πόλεως, both out of the house of her husband, and out of holy places of the city. Nor might she go abroad with any ornaments (Μὴ ἐξεῖναι κοσμεῖσθαι, is the law of Solon): if she did, any body might take them away from her, and tear her clothes in pieces, and beat her, only not maim her in any part of her body. (See the same Petitus, lib. vi. tit. 4.)

Ver. 19. Neither shalt thou steal.] The laws of Draco punished all theft with death: which Solon thought too severe, and therefore changed that punishment into making satisfaction, by restoring double; yet still making it death, if any man stole above such a value, or took any thing out of the public baths, and such-like places, though of never so little value. (See in the same author, lib. vii. tit. 5.)

Ver. 20. Neither shalt thou bear false witness against thy neighbour.] There was an action, at Athens, lay both against false witnesses, and him that produced them; who had a fine set upon them, and were made infamous. And if they were found thrice in the same fault, Τούτους ἔδει καὶ αὐτοὺς, καὶ τοὺς ἐκ τούτων, ἀτίμους εἶναι, both they themselves, and all their posterity, were made infamous, as Andocides speaks. (See ib. p. 559.)

Ver. 21. Neither shalt thou desire thy neighbour's wife, neither shalt thou covet thy neighbour's house, &c.] It is observed by some, that an exact order is observed in the delivery of these precepts: for, first, he places such offences as are consummate, and then those that are but begun, and not perfected. And in the former, he proceeds from those that are most heinous unto those that are less grievous: for those offences are the greatest which disturb the public order, and consequently do mischief unto a great many. Such are those that are committed against governors and rulers, who are comprehended under the name of parents, by whose authority human society is preserved. And then, among those which are against particular persons, those are the greatest which touch a man's life; next, those that wrong his family, the foundation of which is matrimony; then, those that wrong him in his goods, either directly by stealth, or more craftily by bearing false witness. Then, in the last place, those sins are mentioned which are not consummate, being gone no farther than desire; which in Exod. xx. 17. are expressed by one and the same word, but here by two; which we translate desire and covet: between which I know no difference, unless they express higher and lower degrees of the same sin. The contrary to which is, contentedness with our portion, and thankfulness to God for it; which will not let us covet any thing belonging to another man, with his loss and damage.

Ver. 22. These words the Lord spake unto all the assembly in the mount; out of the midst of the fire, of the clouds, and of the thick darkness.] Exod. xix. 16. xx. 18. This confutes the foolish fancy of the Jewish doctors, that the people heard only the first words of God, I am the Lord thy God, &c. thou shalt have no other gods but me; i. e. they heard him declare his existence, and his unity; but all the rest were reported to them by Moses. Nothing can be more contrary to what he here saith, that all these words (that is, the ten words beforementioned) were spoken to their whole assembly. (See More Nevochim, par. ii. cap. 33.)

With a great voice.] That is, so loud that it might be heard by the whole camp.

And he added no more.] All the rest of the commandments, which follow in Exod. xxi. xxii. and xxiii. were delivered to Moses alone, and by him to the people, according to their own desire, (Exod. xx. 19. xxi. 1. xxiv. 3.)

And he wrote them in two tables of stone, and delivered them unto me.] That is, the ten commandments, and no more, (Exod. xxiv. 12. xxxi. 18. xxxiv. 1. 28.) Lest what they heard with their ears should quickly slide out of their minds, he took care to have it engraven with his own hands in these tables.

Ver. 23. And it came to pass, when ye heard the voice out of the midst of the darkness (for the mountain did burn with fire), that ye came near unto me; even all the heads of the tribes and elders.] After they had recovered out of the fright wherein they were at the conclusion of these words: when the thunderings, lightnings, and noise of the trumpet were so terrible, that they removed, and stood afar off, (Exod. xx. 18.)

Ver. 24. And ye said, Behold, the Lord our God hath shewed us his glory, and his greatness, and we have heard his voice out of the midst of the fire.] Here Moses relates more largely what he said in short, Exod. xx. 19.

We have seen this day, that God doth talk with man, and he liveth.] This looks like a thankful acknowledgment of the great goodness of God, in vouchsafing them such a favour as never any men had before, and which they could not expect again. And accordingly Moses makes use of it as an argument to be very observant of God's commands, (Exod. xx. 22, 23.)

Ver. 25. Now, therefore, why should we die? for this great fire will consume us: for if we hear the voice of the Lord our God any more, then we shall die.] It is an ungrounded conceit of Maimonides (in the place abovementioned), that, when they had heard the first words, they fell into a swoon, and did not recover themselves till all the rest were spoken; which made them conclude, that they should really die, and never come to themselves again (as we speak), if they should hear him speak to them any more. The plain meaning is, that mortal men could not endure to hear him speak in that manner: for the voice was so loud, and accompanied with such flashes of fire, and such claps of thunder, as made them conclude, if it had continued longer, they should have expired.

Ver. 26. For who is there of all flesh.] i. e. Of all men who are weak and frail, as the word flesh denotes.

That hath heard the voice of the living God, speaking out of the midst of fire (as we have) and lived?] There is no instance of such a thing as this, which made them afraid of hearing him speak, in this manner, any more: for they did not mind God's end and intention in this, (which Moses suggests to them in Exod. xx. 20.) but in a confusion of thoughts imagined, that though they had escaped once, the flames out of which he spake might devour them, if they came near them again.

Ver. 27. Go thou near, and hear all that the Lord our God will say; and speak thou unto us all that the Lord our God shall speak unto thee, and we will hear it, and do it.] See Exod. xx. 19. This shews their opinion of Moses, that he could be able not only to endure that without disorder which made them ready to die, but go into the very midst of the darkness out of which those flames came.

Ver. 28. And the Lord heard the voice of your words when ye spake unto me; and the Lord said unto me, I have heard the voice of the words of this people, &c.] As Moses here reports more largely what they said to him than he did in Exodus, so he likewise gives a larger account what God bade him say to them, in answer to their desire.

They have well said all that they have spoken.] It very much becomes them, out of a sense of their meanness and unworthiness, and of the inconceivable majesty of God, to desire he would speak to them by a mediator.

Ver. 29. Oh that there were such a heart in them, that they would fear me, and keep my commandments always.] The words are wonderful emphatical in the Hebrew, Who will give, that there may be such a heart in them. Which is an expression of the most earnest desire; but withal signifies, that if what he had done for them would not move them to fear and obey him, it was impossible to persuade them to it. Not but that he could miraculously work upon them, and change their hearts (saith Maimonides), if he pleased, as he miraculously changed the nature of other things; but if this were God's will, to deal with them after this fashion, there would have been no need to send a prophet to them, or to publish laws full of precepts and promises, rewards and punishments; by which (saith he) God wrought upon their heart, and not by his absolute omnipotence. (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 32.)

That it might be well with them, and with their children for ever!] For God desired nothing more than this, which they themselves promised, (ver. 27.) which moved him to vouchsafe such a special privilege to them, as first to speak to them himself, and, at their desire, consent to speak to them by his prophet.

Ver. 30. Go say to them, Get you into your tents again.] All this shews that Moses was a mediator between God and them, and between them and God.

Ver. 31. But as for thee, stand thou here by me.] He invites Moses unto the nearest approaches unto his majesty; and the most familiar converse with him, (Exod. xx. 21. xxiv. 2. 18.) For this was the highest degree of prophecy, as Maimonides calls it, in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 51. And in his preface to that book, he saith, this is the greatest degree of illumination of a prophet, concerning whom it is said, Stand thou here with me: and again, The skin of his face shone. Which he supposes signified, that his mind was always full of light; whereas other prophets were some time in darkness, and saw nothing.

And I will speak unto thee all the commandments, and the statutes, and the judgments, which thou shalt teach them.] According to their own desire, ver. 27. (See vi. 1.)

And that they may do them in the land which I give them to possess it.] According to their promise in the same, ver. 27.

Ver. 32. Ye shall observe to do therefore as the Lord your God hath commanded you.] Being obliged by such singular benefits as no other nation ever had the like, (ver. 24—26.) and having engaged themselves so solemnly to be obedient, (ver. 27.)

Ye shall not turn aside, to the right hand, or to the left.] This is a phrase often used to signify a strict observance of God's laws; neither superstitiously adding to them, nor profanely laying aside any of them, (xvii. 20. xxviii. 14. Josh. i. 7.)

Ver. 33. Ye shall walk in all the ways which the Lord your God hath commanded.] That is, observe all his laws, and make them the rule of their lives.

That ye may live, and that it may be well with you, and that ye may prolong your days, in the land which ye shall possess.] Universal obedience, he would have them sensible, was the only way to make them live happy and long in that good land which he was about to bestow upon them. This he inculcates again in the next chapter, vi. 3. For all mankind thought long life a very great blessing, as appears by Callimachus's hymn to Diana, ver. 132, 133. when he promises to those whom she favours,

——————— οὐδ' ἐπὶ σῆμα
Ἔρχονται, πλὴν εἴτε πολυχρόνιόν τι φέρωσιν.

i. e. They shall not come into their grave, till they have reached a great old age.

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. NOW these are the commandments, the statutes, and the judgments.] Which God promised to deliver to him, in the foregoing chapter, ver. 31.; and commandments are thought commonly to relate unto the moral laws; statutes to rites and ceremonies, which have no natural reason for them; and judgments to civil government.

Which the Lord your God commanded to teach you, that ye might do them in the land whither ye go to possess it.] They are the words of God himself, in the place beforenamed, ver. 31.

This, I suppose, was spoken by Moses to them, a little time after he had delivered what is contained in the foregoing chapter; being a preface to the rest of the laws which he received from God in Mount Sinai, as they desired.

Ver. 2. That thou mightest fear the Lord thy God, to keep all his statutes, and his commandments, which I command thee, &c.] The prime intention of God's speaking to them by himself and by Moses was, to implant his fear in their hearts, as the true principle of obedience; which so certainly flows from it, if it be preserved in its power and force, that it frequently in Scripture signifies the whole duty we owe to God. But here, more particularly, it seems to signify their adhering to him as the only God: so it is used, 1 Kings xviii. 3. 12. and in the New Testament most plainly, Acts x. 2. 35.

Ver. 3, Hear therefore, O Israel, and observe to do it.] Mark therefore so well what I say, as to do accordingly.

That it may be well with thee, &c.] As the only way to be happy, and to grow a mighty nation, and, in short, enjoy all that God had promised to their pious ancestors.

Ver. 4. Hear, O Israel.] He repeats it again, because what he was going to say is of the highest importance.

The Lord our God is one Lord.] Being to remind them of all the laws which God delivered to them by him, and to endeavour to beget a holy fear of him, as the principle of obedience, he most earnestly presses upon them, before he proceeds further, the first of the ten commandments; which is, that there is but one God, who alone is to be worshipped; and that he is their God: whose laws therefore could not be controlled by the authority of any other pretended god.

Many of the ancient fathers, particularly Theodoret and Greg. Nyssen, think there is a plain intimation of the blessed Trinity in these words, The Lord our God is one Lord: and some of the Jews themselves have thought, there was something extraordinary in it, that the name of God should be thrice mentioned, as it is in this sentence: which signifies three midoth, or properties, they confess; which they sometimes call three faces, or emanations, or sanctifications, or numerations, though they will not call them three persons; as Joseph de Voysin observes, in his book against an Anonymous Anti-trinitarian, p. 58. 63. 71, 72. And the cabalists say as much, who, asserting ten sephiroth in God (which they take to be something different from the essence of God, and yet not creatures, but emanations from it, as Manasseh ben Israel explains their words), they make the three first of them to be more than the other seven; and call them primordial. The first of which they call the Wonderful Intelligence, and the First Intellectual Light (as St. James calls God the Father of lights), and the First Glory. The second they call, among other names, the Illuminating Intelligence (just as St. John saith, the eternal Word "enlightens every one that cometh into the world"), and the Second Glory. And the third they call the Sanctified Intelligence (so the word מקודש, which is in Pual, must be translated, not sanctifying, as Rittangelius takes it,) or they may mean no more than the Holy Intelligence; which is the very same with the Holy Spirit. All this we find in the book Jetzira, which they fancy was made by Abraham: from whence we cannot but learn, that they had an obscure notion of the blessed Trinity: and that the apostles used no other language about it, than what was among the Jews. The best of which are so sensible of such things, as I have mentioned, that they think we Christians are not idolaters, though we believe three persons in the Godhead (which they fancy inclines to polytheism), because we believe the unity of God; and therefore may be saved as well as they. So J. Wagenseil shews in his annotations upon Sota, cap. 7. p. 751, &c. and Arnoldus, in his Spicilegia, after him, p. 1218.

Ver. 5. And thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, &c.] Our blessed Saviour, alleging these two verses, (Mark xii. 29, 30.) looks upon these words as a part of the first commandment: for, after he had said, "The first of all the commandments is, Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord; and, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul," &c. he thus concludes, "this is the first commandment." For, to own him to be the only God, the author of our being and of all things, doth necessarily include in it a love of him above all things whatsoever, which requires us to love him, who hath made them so lovely. This is another principle or spring of obedience, inseparable from the fear of God beforementioned: which doth not drive us away from him, but draw us to him; being such a reverence towards him as children have to their kind parents, which is ever mixed with love to them.

With all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might.] For there being no other God but he alone, none else could have any right to their love and service, but he only whose nature is so excellent, that it requires the utmost we can do to testify our regard to him. This one of the Jewish writers hath admirably expressed in this manner; "Whosoever serves God out of love, he gives himself to the study of his laws, and unto good works, &c. which excite him to love God with the most flagrant affection; not for the sake of any thing in this world, nor for the fear of any evil; but he serves God truly, because he is the truth, and the chiefest good, that he may be admitted to communion with him. And a man ought to love him with the most vehement and intense affection; so that he languish with love to him, just as a man that is in love with one he desires to make his wife: wheresoever he is, at home or abroad, when he eats and drinks, when he lies down and rises up, he thinks of her. To which Solomon compares the love of the spouse, who saith, I am sick of love," (Cant. ii. 5.) To this purpose, Baal Chasidim, mentioned by Wagenseil, upon Sota, cap. 5. p. 611.

By the heart may be here meant the will, which is the original of all that a man doth (as the Jews speak), whether good or evil: by the soul, the affections (to which St. Mark adds the mind, i. e. the understanding, or rational faculty); and by might or strength, is meant the power of the body for action; which four all together make up the whole man. And the word all added to each of these, doth not exclude all other things from any share in our thoughts and affections, but only from an equal interest in them. The love of God ought to be superior, and direct all our other motions to serve him, as Maimonides expresses it in his preface to Pirke Avoth.

Ver. 7. And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children.] In the Hebrew the words are (as our margin observes), shall whet or sharpen them: signifying, as some think, that they should endeavour to make them pierce their hearts. But De Dieu rather thinks it signifies beat them into them, as things are hammered on an anvil with repeated strokes. Which the famous Bochartus doth not so well approve; who observes, that the word sanan, which in Arabic signifies, in the first place, to sharpen or whet, signifies also exquisite docere, &c. to teach exquisitely; so that he who is taught be made thereby more acute and perspicacious. Which is the intention he thinks of the Hebrew word here, lib. ii. Canaan, cap. 17. However it be expounded, it imports the diligence they should use (as we translate it), to instil this principle into their children's minds, that there is but one God; and to work in them a fear and love of his Divine Majesty. To that which goes before (ver. 4—6.) these words have a particular respect. By which it appears, that Moses thought his law was so plain, that every father might be able to instruct his sons in it, and every mother her daughters.

And thou shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up.] As much as to say, they should take all occasions to inculcate this great thing, at home and abroad, night and day; never ceasing their most earnest endeavours, to persuade their children not to worship any other God; nor to fail to worship the Lord their God with sincere affection.

The Jews have made from hence one of their affirmative precepts, that twice a day, at least, they should recite these words, Hear, O Israel, &c. which is a very dilute sense of this precept: wherein Moses requires not merely their saying these words (in which there might be a great deal of superstition), but taking all opportunities to imprint them upon the minds and hearts of their children.

Ver. 8. And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes.] Just thus he commands them to preserve the memory of their deliverance out of the land of Egypt, almost in the same words: see Exod. xiii. 9. 16. where this is sufficiently explained. And it appears to be a proverbial speech from Isa. xlix. 16. There are some learned men, indeed, who take these words literally, notwithstanding St. Jerome hath delivered his opinion to the contrary, that there is no command for phylacteries, which are grounded upon these words, particularly Jos. Scaliger, in his Elench. Trihæres. Nic. Serarii, cap. 7, 8. where he thinks God gave this command to the Israelites, to prevent their following the rites of other nations, who armed themselves against dangers with superstitious amulets in their foreheads; which the Egyptians, he thinks, called totaphot. But since, neither here nor in Exodus, there are any such words as thou shalt make thee frontlets, but Moses only saith the things that he is speaking of shall be for frontlets between their eyes, I take it not to be meant literally; though it is likely they intended well who so understood it: for our blessed Saviour doth not seem to reprove the Jews for wearing phylacteries, but for their ostentation, in making them broader than ordinary.

Ver. 9. And thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates.] This looks more like a literal command than the former; and it might have been very useful to them, when they went in and out of their house, to read these words, Hear, O Israel, the Lord thy God is one Lord, &c. But the Jews are too scrupulous about the words they should write, and upon what part of the posts and gates they were to put them, &c. as Mr. Selden observes, (lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 13. n. 2.) Though, after all, it may be, this was not intended, but only that they should never let this principle slip out of their mind, but think of it when they went out and came in, as well as when they were in their houses, and by the way; when they rose up, and when they lay down. Yet it must be observed, that other nations used to write their laws upon their gates, as Huetius notes in his Demonstratio Evangelica, (p. 58.) which, it is likely, they did in imitation of the Jews, who, to this day, have written in a parchment these words from ver. 4. to the end of this verse, (with that other passage, chap. xi. from ver. 13. to ver. 20.) which they roll up, and writing on it the name of Shaddai, put it into a piece of cane, or other hollow wood, and fasten it to the doors of their houses, and of each particular room in them; and, as often as they go in and out, they make it a part of their devotion to touch this parchment, and kiss it; as Leo Modena tells us, in his History of the Jews, par. i. cap. 2.

Ver. 10. And it shall be, when the Lord thy God shall have brought thee into the land, which he sware, &c.] Of this he speaks with the greatest assurance, there being no doubt to be made, that God would immediately give them possession of the good land promised to them. The only danger was, lest they should be thrown out of it for their disobedience.

Great and goodly cities, which thou buildest not.] For they did not lay all waste, as they did Jericho (for which there was a particular reason), but dwelt in them, after they had destroyed the inhabitants.

Ver. 11. And houses full of all good things, which thou fillest not, &c.] In this, and what follows in the rest of the verse, he sets forth the great bounty of God to them; who intended to enrich them with all manner of good things, without any labour of their own to purchase them.

Ver. 12. Then beware lest thou forget the Lord which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt, &c.] In prosperity we are too prone to forget our benefactors.

Ver. 13. Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God, and serve him.] Preserve an awful sense of him in thy mind, and be constant in his worship and service; which was never more necessary, than when they enjoyed so many blessings from him.

And shalt swear by his name.] When there was any need for it: as in making covenants with their neighbours, or in bearing their testimony before a judge, they were to swear only by the name of God, not by any idol, nor by the heaven, or the earth, or any thing therein; for they can bear witness to nothing. (See Josh. xxiii. 7, 8.) Nor was it lawful, as Maimonides observes (in his treatise called Shebuoth), to join any other thing with the name of God. But it was all one, whether a man sware by the proper name of God, or by any of his attributes; as, by the name of Him who is merciful, or gracious, or long-suffering, &c. for this is a perfect oath. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 11. n. 2. and see n. 7. concerning other oaths.)

Ver. 14. Ye shall not go after other gods, of the gods of the people which are round about you.] This shews that his intention in this chapter is, to press upon them the observation of the first commandment, which our Saviour justly calls the great commandment.

Ver. 15. For the Lord thy God is a jealous God.] See Exod. xx. 5. Exod. xxxiv. 14.

Among you.] In the Hebrew, in the midst of you; to observe all you do, though never so secretly.

Lest the anger of the Lord thy God be kindled against thee, and destroy thee from off the face of the earth.] For this was the most provoking of all other sins: and therefore we never read either in the law, or in the prophets, the word charon (i. e. fury), or aph (anger), or caas (indignation), or kinah (jealousy), ascribed unto God, but when mention is made of idolatry. So Maimonides observes, More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 36.

Ver. 16. Ye shall not tempt the Lord your God, as you tempted him in Massah.] Never distrust God's good providence, nor murmur against him in any distress: for this was the temptation at Massah, (Exod. xvii. 2—7.)

Ver. 17. You shall diligently keep the commandments of the Lord your God, and his testimonies, and his statutes, which he hath commanded thee.] As if he had said, I cannot too often press this upon you; nor can you use too great care in this matter.

Ver. 18. And thou shalt do that which is right and good in the sight of the Lord, that it may be well with thee.] As they loved themselves, he charges them not to follow their own desires (which is called doing that which is good in their own eyes), but govern themselves by his holy will.

And that thou mayest go in and possess the good land.] Or rather, after thou hast gone in, and possessed the good land which the Lord sware unto thy fathers: for there was no doubt of their going in; but only of their behaviour there, after they were made so happy, ver. 10—12.

Ver. 19. To cast out all thine enemies from before thee, as the Lord hath spoken.] He seems particularly to charge them to drive out the people of Canaan, as God hath commanded, (Numb. xxxiii. 32.) For otherwise they would tempt them to forget this great principle of their religion, that the God of Israel was the only God, and entice them to serve their idols, (ver. 14.)

Ver. 20. And when thy son asketh thee in time to come, saying, What mean the testimonies, and the statutes, and the judgments, which the Lord our God hath commanded you?] Abarbinel thinks, that their posterity, in future ages, might observe three sorts of precepts in the law, viz. testimonies, which in Hebrew are called eduth, which were such constitutions as bear witness of some great thing God had done for them, and preserved the memory thereof; such was the Passover. And then, secondly, there were chukkim (statutes), which are such precepts the reason of which is unknown. And, thirdly, mischpatim (judgments), which are such, whose reason is evident. Now they might desire to know the reason why such several laws were given; and he thinks Moses teaches them to give a distinct answer to their children about each of these.

Ver. 21. Then thou shalt say unto thy son, We were Pharaoh's bondmen in Egypt, and the Lord brought us out of Egypt with a mighty hand.] As if he had said, tell them the reason why he gave us the first sort of precepts, particularly that about the Passover, was, because we were slaves, and God brought us a state of liberty; which he would have always thankfully remembered, by the observation of that feast which testified what God wrought for us by his power alone. The like may be said of the other two great festivals, which were to preserve the memory of such-like benefits.

Ver. 22. And the Lord shewed signs and wonders, great and sore, upon Egypt, upon Pharaoh, and all his household, &c.] Particularly slew all their first-born, and spared those of the Israelites: the memory of which he ordered to be preserved, by giving their first-born unto him, (Exod. xiii.)

Ver. 23. And he brought us out from thence, that he might bring us in, to give us the land which he sware to our fathers.] This is the reason, Abarbinel fancies, of giving them the judgments beforementioned: God brought us out, saith he, to place us in this good land, and settle us here under a government of our own. Now civil society cannot be preserved without just judgments: and therefore, that we might live in good order, God gave us these political laws.

Ver. 24. And the Lord commanded us to do all these statutes, to fear the Lord our God.] As for the third sort, which are statutes, give your children this answer: that though we do not know the reason of them, yet the benefit of them is manifest; for they lead us to the fear of God. And nothing is so much for our good as that, both for the eternal good of our souls, and for the long life of our bodies. So he interprets the last words of this verse; and so doth Maimonides.

For our good always, that he may preserve us alive, as it is at this day.] The first words in the Hebrew are, that it may be well with us all our days; or, more literally, for good to us all our days: that is, say our rabbins, (they are the words of Maimonides, par. iii. More Nevochim, cap. 27. where he repeats what I observed before upon iv. 40.) That it may be well with us in that world which is wholly good; and our days may be prolonged in that world which is wholly long; or, in short, that thou mayest come into the world which is good and long, which is a perpetual subsistence. As for the last words, they belong, he thinks, to their corporeal subsistence here, which endures but for a time; and therefore he saith, As at this day; to shew he speaks of the present world, wherein they should live happily by observing his laws.

Ver. 25. And it shall be our righteousness, if we observe to do all these commandments.] Their children might say, If there be such benefits in observing the statutes, which lead to the fear of God, and to happiness hereafter, what need we trouble ourselves about the other two? Unto which, Abarbinel imagines, they are taught to give this answer, It is our righteousness, if we observe to do all these commandments; i. e. We cannot be righteous before God, if they have not respect to all his precepts, whether testimonies, statutes, or judgments, which are all comprehended in this word mitzvoth, or commandments. This is something nice and curious, but there is a great deal of truth in it.

The word righteousness also, it must be acknowledged, often comprehends mercy in it: and thus the LXX. and the Vulgar Latin here understand it. And to take in this sense, these words may be thus expounded: If we observe to do all these commandments, God will account us a righteous people, and be kind to us.

Before the Lord our God, as he hath commanded us.] Having a sincere respect to God in all that we do.

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. WHEN the Lord thy God shall bring thee into the land whither thou goest to possess it.] That is, when he had put them into possession of it.

And hath cast out many nations before thee, the Hittites, and the Girgashites, and the Amorites, and the Canaanites, and the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites, &c.] There were ten nations inhabited in this country in the days of Abraham: but three of them were either worn out since that time, or, being but a small people, were incorporated with the rest: for the Kenites and the Kenezites (see Gen. xv. 19.) are not mentioned after that time, and the Rephaim possessed but a little part of Canaan, the great body of them being in Bashan, on this side Jordan, where Moses now was: (see upon Gen. xv. 19.)

Seven nations greater and mightier than thou.] The Amorites alone seem to have been mightier than the Israelites (for there were no less than five kings of them, that dwelt in the mountains, Josh. x. 5, 6. besides those in other parts), and therefore all the seven nations were much superior to them in strength.

Ver. 2. And when the Lord thy God shall deliver them before thee, thou shalt smite them, and utterly destroy them, &c.] He still pursues his intention, to preserve in them a due care to observe the first commandment, of which he began to treat in the foregoing chapter: for that is the reason why they were to destroy these seven nations, that they might not be in danger to be seduced by them to serve other gods, (ver. 1.) But whether they were not first to offer them terms of peace, according to the directions in the twentieth chapter of this book, is a question which I have endeavoured to resolve in another place, upon Exod. xxiii. 33. Certain it is, that if they refused their offers, there was the greater reason to be severe to them: and without offering them any terms, God might in justice order the Israelites to destroy them: for every king hath power in his dominions to cut off evil-doers; and therefore much more the King of kings: who might order whom he pleased (as other kings do) to be executioners in his vengeance upon these seven nations, for their abominable idolatries, beastly lusts, and horrid cruelties, and other such-like sins, of which they were guilty.

This was a thing of such moment, that God ordered Moses to give them this charge some time ago, (Numb. xxxiii. 52.) which he now renews.

Thou shalt make no covenant with them.] To suffer them to live with them, in the same country, (Exod. xxxiv. 12.)

Nor shew mercy to them.] For that had been cruelty to themselves and their posterity, to spare such incurable idolaters. How far the Talmudists extend this, see in Dionys. Vossius, upon Maimonides's treatise of Idolatry, p. 139. and Maimonides himself, in the following paragraphs, 4—6.

Ver. 3. Neither shalt thou make marriages with them: thy daughters thou shalt not give to his sons; nor his daughters shalt thou take to thy sons.] See Exod. xxxiv. 15. Some of the Jews think they might marry with them, if they became proselytes of justice (as they called those who received circumcision, and undertook to observe the whole law); and that they might think this was not lawful, yet think that they might marry with the children of such proselytes: (see Selden, lib. v. de Jure Nat. et Gent. &c. cap. 14, 15.) And the Talmudists say, this law did not extend to proselytes, who might marry with any of these nations, as he shews there, cap. 18.

Ver. 4. For they will turn away thy sons from following me, that they may serve other gods, &c.] There was great danger, if they loved their wives, that they might draw them to their idolatry; in which they were so rooted, that there was little hope of converting them to the true religion. Therefore this is opposed to the love of the Lord their God; for the preserving of which in their hearts they are forbidden such marriages, (Josh. xxiii. 11, 12.) And indeed it was but a piece of natural equity, that they should abstain from such familiarity with those who would certainly undo them. Which made Abraham, before this law, charge his son Isaac, not to take a wife from among the Canaanites; and the same care was taken of Jacob. And when this law of Moses was abolished, the apostle warns Christians themselves against such unequal matches, (2 Cor. vi. 14.) The danger of which David had noted, Psal. cvi. 35, 36. "So will the anger of the Lord be kindled against you," &c. (See vi. 15.)

Ver. 5. But thus shall ye deal with them.] Or, therefore thus shall ye deal with them; that is, to prevent the forementioned mischief, he orders them to leave no relic of their idolatry remaining.

Ye shall destroy their altars.] The very same precept, Exod. xxxiv. 13.

And break down their images.] The very same words with these are in Exod. xxiii. 24. (only there it is said, quite break down), and in Exod. xxxiv. 13.

And cut down their groves.] There is the same mention of asherim (which we translate groves) in the place last named; only another word for cut down (see there). But Mr. Selden, both there and here, understands by asherim, wooden images of Astarte, a great goddess worshipped in that country: for which, among other reasons, he gives this, that Gideon is said to have thrown down the altar of Baal, and cut down the grove that was by it. So we translate it, Judg. vi. 25. 28. where, in the Hebrew, the last word is alau, which signifies upon it, and not by it: and so the LXX. Ἐπ' αὐτῷ. And therefore the asherah, which is said to be upon the altar, must not signify a grove, but an image; and none more likely than that of Astarte. (See de Diis Syris Syntagm. ii. cap. 2. and 2 Kings xxiii. 6, 7.)

And burn their graven images with fire.] As he was commanded to destroy their molten images, (Numb. xxxiii. 52.) that so no sort of image, nor any monument of their worship, might be left in the country, but all so entirely abolished, that they might have no incentive to idolatry. This was the work of the supreme governor, as Grotius prudently observes: for though out of private places it belonged to the lord of the place, or, if he were negligent, to the king, to remove idols, yet none but the supreme power might remove them out of public places, or such persons who were delegated thereby to that office. (See L. de Imper. Sum. Potest. circa Sacra, cap. 8. sect. 3.)

Ver. 6. For thou art a holy people unto the Lord thy God.] This is an argument frequently used, particularly in the book of Leviticus, why they should cleave to God alone; because he had separated them to himself by many peculiar laws, which no other people had but they. (Levit. xi. 44, 45. xix. 2. xx. 7. 26.)

The Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth.] As he had distinguished them from all other people by peculiar laws, so by special favours and singular privileges which no other nation whatsoever enjoyed. (See Exod. xix. 5, 6.) Some interpret the words special people, to signify that they belonged to none but him; and he had no other people but they; whom he had espoused to himself. From whence it is, that, as the Israelites are called God's people, so that country is called his land, (Psal. lxxxv. 1.) for there he dwelt by his special presence. And the king of that country is called God's king, (Psal. xviii. 50.) and he is said to sit on God's throne; and to be Melech le Jehovah, king for the Lord, (2 Chron. ix. 8.) and the kingdom is called the kingdom of the Lord, (xiii. 8.) and therefore with this argument Asa addresses himself to God in the next chapter, (xiv. 11.) for help in time of distress, because he was their God; and would not, he hoped, let their enemies prevail against himself. And accordingly these enemies are said to be "destroyed before the Lord, and before his host," (ver. 13.) Jehoshaphat also exhorts the judges in that book to great caution, (2 Chron. xix. 6.) because they judged not for man, but for the Lord. And the prophet exhorts, in the following chapter, (xx. 15.) not to be afraid of a mighty host which came against him, because the battle is not yours, but God's; the cause in which they fought being his, more than their own.

Ver. 7. The Lord did not set his love upon you, nor choose you.] To be his special people, as he calls them in the foregoing verse.

Because ye were more in number than any people; for ye were the fewest of all people.] When God declared his love first to Abraham and his posterity he had no child, Gen. xii. 1—3. xv. 1, 2. And when he had, his family continued so small, after there were twelve heirs of the promise, that in the space of two hundred years they were but seventy persons, (Gen. xlvi. 27.) Nor do we read of any great increase of them till after the death of Joseph, which was near fourscore years more, (Exod. i. 7, 8, &c.) So St. Stephen observes, Acts vii. 17. "When the time of the promise drew nigh, which God had sworn to Abraham, the people grew and multiplied in Egypt."

Ver. 8. But because the Lord loved you.] Because it was his good pleasure to single them out from all other people, to receive special tokens of his favour to them.

And because he would keep the oath, which he had sworn unto your fathers, hath the Lord brought you out with a mighty hand, &c.] Not for any desert of theirs; but to make good his promise confirmed with an oath, did he work their wonderful deliverance out of Egypt, (Gen. xv. 13, 14. xxii. 16, &c.)

Ver. 9. Know therefore that the Lord thy God, he is God.] He exhorts them therefore to preserve this sense in their mind, that their God is the only God.

The faithful God, which keepeth covenant and mercy with them that love him, and keep his commandments, &c.] Who will not only faithfully keep his word and make good his promises, but do abundantly more than he hath promised to those that cleave unto him alone, and serve no other God: for it appears by the second commandment, that is peculiarly meant by loving him.

To a thousand generations.] See Exod. xx. 6.

Ver. 10. And repay them that hate him.] Punish all idolaters, who are peculiarly called haters of God, as I have often observed. (See Exod. xx. 5.)

To their face.] They themselves should live to see and feel the punishment of their idolatry. So the Chaldee paraphrases it, Bacajehon, in their life.

He will not be slack to him that hateth him, he will repay him to his face.] Though he do not punish him immediately, yet he will not defer it long, but be avenged of him before he die. Therefore, when he threatens to punish them to the third and fourth generation, the meaning is not that he will only punish their posterity, but them with their posterity; whom they shall see destroyed before their face. For the fourth generation (as Maimonides observes) is as much as the oldest men commonly live to see.

Ver. 11. Thou shalt therefore keep the commandments, and the statutes, and the judgments, which I command thee this day, to do them.] All the laws of God, (see vi. 1.) especially this great commandment, to have no other God but him.

Ver. 12. Wherefore it shall come to pass, if ye hearken to these judgments, and keep and do them, that the Lord thy God shall keep unto thee the covenant and mercy which he sware unto thy fathers.] As faithfully fulfil his promises to them, as he did to their fathers.

Ver. 13. And he will love thee.] Continue his love to them.

And bless thee, and multiply thee.] This was the great promise made to their fathers, that he would make their posterity as numerous as the stars of heaven, and the dust of the earth, (Gen. xv. 5. xxii. 17. xxviii. 14.)

He will also bless the fruit of thy womb.] Preserve them from miscarrying, that so they might multiply.

And the fruit of thy land, thy corn, and thy wine, and thine oil.] By giving them rain in due season, &c. (See Lev. xxvi. 4, 5.)

The increase of thy kind.] The Hebrew word segar, which we translate increase, the LXX. Vulgar, and Syriac, render the herds. But Onkelos and Jonathan translate it as we do, the young ones which the mothers bring forth. (See Bochart. par. i. Hierozoicon, lib. ii. cap. 30.)

And the flocks of thy sheep.] The Hebrew word ashtaroth comprehends flocks both of sheep and of greater cattle, as the same Bochart observes, par. i. Hieroz. lib. iii. cap. 43. and in his Canaan, lib. ii. cap. 2. where he observes, that the goddess Astarte, in those countries, was thought to preside over flocks of sheep and herds of oxen.

Ver. 14. And thou shalt be blessed above all people.] He promises to make them as singular for his favours, as they were in their laws and manner of living.

There shall not be male or female barren among you, or among your cattle.] See Exod. xxiii. 26.

Ver. 15. And the Lord will take away from thee all sickness.] Or remove from them the common diseases and infirmities of mankind; so that they should die in a good old age (as the Scripture speaks); which tended manifestly to their increase and multiplication.

And will put none of the evil diseases of Egypt (which thou knowest) upon thee.] Neither those blotches or biles which God, by an immediate hand, smote them withal, (Exod. ix. 9. xv. 26.) nor any other which they in that country were subject unto, peculiarly their filthy ulcers, called Egyptiaca and Syriaca, as Casaubon observes upon Persius, Sat. v. p. 467. with which the priests of Isis were wont to threaten and terrify poor people, if they did not worship her. In opposition to which our very learned Dr. Spencer thinks God made this special promise to his people, to preserve them from all such evil diseases, if they kept themselves pure from that Egyptian idolatry. Which is very ingenious, if the worship of Isis was so ancient as the days of Moses. (See lib. i. de Legibus Hebr. Ritual. cap. 3.)

And will lay them upon all them that hate thee.] And thereby disable them to hurt his people.

Ver. 16. And thou shalt consume all the people, which the Lord thy God shall deliver thee.] Utterly destroy all the people of Canaan, when they had conquered them, as he commanded them before, ver. 7.

Thine eyes shall have no pity upon them.] The reason of this severity was, because of their abominable wickedness, as I there observed.

Neither shalt thou serve their gods, for that will be a snare unto thee.] In the Hebrew, and thou shalt not serve their gods, &c. This severity was used to prevent their being enticed by them to their idolatry, if they had suffered them to live among them.

Ver. 17. If thou shalt say in thine heart, These nations are more than I; how shall I dispossess them?] If such a diffidence began to arise in their hearts, as possessed their forefathers, (Numb. xiv.)

Ver. 18. Thou shalt not be afraid of them, but shalt well remember what the Lord thy God did unto Pharaoh, and unto all Egypt.] He requires them immediately to expel all fear by faith in God; which the remembrance of what God had done for them, if seriously reflected on, might well work in them.

Ver. 19. The great temptations which thine eyes saw, and the signs, and the wonders, and the mighty hand, &c.] Of all these he had put them in mind before, (iv. 34.) and now renews the remembrance of it, that the experience they had of God's power and goodness might banish all fear out of their hearts.

Ver. 20. Moreover, the Lord thy God will send the hornet among them.] Raise up enemies which they think not of to infest them, that is, unusual swarms of hornets, and of an unusual bigness, it is like, which came like an army upon them. (See Exod. xxiii. 28.)

Until they that are left, and hide themselves from thee, be destroyed.] Which should pursue those that fled from the Israelites, and sting them to death in their lurking-holes.

Ver. 21. Thou shalt not be affrighted at them.] Let all this inspire you with courage.

For the Lord thy God is among you, a mighty God, and a terrible.] The Sovereign of the world, of whose goodness you have had such long experience, dwells among you, and conducts and leads you, wheresoever you go: and who can stand before him? (See Exod. xvii. 7.)

Ver. 22. And the Lord thy God will put out these nations before thee, by little and little: thou mayest not consume them at once, lest the beasts of the field increase upon thee.] Be not discouraged, though they be not destroyed all at once: there is great reason against that, concerning which see Exod. xxiii. 21. where this verse is explained.

Ver. 23. But the Lord thy God shall deliver them unto thee, and shall destroy them with a mighty destruction, until they be destroyed.] In time he will deliver them all up into thy hand; and thou shalt so overpower them, as to leave none of them remaining.

Ver. 24. And he shall deliver their kings into thy hand.] As he did, we read in the book of Joshua, xii. 7—9, &c. where thirty-one kings are enumerated, who were conquered by him.

And thou shalt destroy their name from under heaven.] There shall no memory, of so much as the names of such men, be left any where.

There shall no man be able to stand before thee until thou have destroyed them.] The kings and great men of the country being destroyed, their victory was easier over the rest.

Ver. 25. The graven images of their gods shall ye burn with fire.] This he had required before, ver. 5. but mentions it again, to let them know, that if they did not perform their part of the covenant (of which this was the chief), God would not destroy the inhabitants of Canaan totally. As we find he did not, Judg. ii. 2, 3. and for this very reason, as Joshua had told them, xxiii. 12, 13.

Thou shalt not desire the silver and gold that is upon them.] The Jews are too nice and curious who expound this only of the gold and silver clothes, or the chains, or other jewels of gold and silver, wherewith their images were adorned; because he saith, upon them. There is no reason to doubt but he means, that they should be destroyed, if they were entirely made of massy gold and silver; which they were not to convert to their own use: for thus Moses did with the golden calf, Exod. xxxii. 20. and Jacob in ancienter time buried all the strange gods, as well as the ear-rings that were in their ears, (Gen. xxxv. 4.) And Josiah, in future ages, burnt every thing that had been employed to idolatry, even the vessels that were made for Baal, as well as the images, &c. and stamped them to powder, (2 Kings xxiii. 4. 6. 14, 15.)

Nor take it unto thee, lest thou be snared therein.] Be drawn into a conceit, that there was something sacred in it, and so tempted to worship it.

For it is an abomination to the Lord thy God.] Whatsoever hath been employed to such idolatrous worship, is so detestable unto the Divine Majesty, that he will not have it converted to any ordinary and common use, but utterly destroyed.

Ver. 26. Neither shalt thou bring an abomination into thy house.] And therefore he requires them not to bring any of that silver and gold which had belonged to those idols (which he calls an abomination) into their houses, to be employed unto any private use whatsoever: so the Jews understand these words, having made from hence one of their affirmative precepts: that no man should seek the least profit or benefit from any thing appertaining to an idol.

Lest thou be a cursed thing like it.] Every thing that was idolatrous was a cherem, devoted to destruction, as he saith in the last words, it is a cursed thing, which no man might meddle withal, (xiii. 17.) If he did, he became an accursed thing, i. e. was devoted to destruction, as the thing itself was. This was apparent afterward in the example of Achan, (Josh. vii.) who took a wedge of gold and a Babylonish garment for his own private use, when it had been made a cherem by God's express command, (Josh. vi. 17.) and therefore was stoned to death.

But thou shalt utterly detest it, and thou shalt utterly abhor it.] Not only look upon it as useless and unprofitable, but as hateful and execrable in the highest degree, and therefore to be entirely destroyed. All this tended to their preservation in the true religion; which taught them to have every thing contrary to it in the utmost detestation: insomuch, (as Maimonides interprets this precept, in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 37.) that if any man broke such images, or melted them down, and then sold the silver and gold, he committed an abomination; and the price of this being mingled with his other riches, proved the rust of them all. This he thinks is the meaning of bringing an abomination into their house. Which was so far from bringing a blessing (as the heathen imagined), that it brought a curse upon all that they had.

The Jews were so sensible of all this, after they had severely smarted for their idolatry, that they thought it unlawful to use any vessel that had been employed in sacrificing to a false god; nay, to warm themselves with the wood of a grove that was cut down; or to sit under the shadow of it, for coolness' sake, while it was standing; or so much as to use the ashes of the wood that were left after the grove was burnt. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. juxta Discipl. Heb. cap. 7. p. 215, 216, &c.)

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1. ALL the commandments which I command thee this day shall ye observe to do.] He seems still to press them to have a special care to observe the ten commandments, and especially the first of them, (vi. 4—6.) For it appears by the latter end of this chapter that he hath a regard to that.

That ye may live.] Long and happily: for life, every one knows, frequently signifies all the comforts of life, as death signifies all manner of miseries.

And multiply.] Which is the effect of a long and happy life.

And go in and possess the land, &c. or, after ye go in and possess the land, which the Lord sware unto your fathers.] See vi. 18.

Ver. 2. And thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness.] Whereby they were severely punished for the rebellion of their forefathers against him; which should be an admonition to them to be more dutiful. Others expound it of the care of God over them, in providing for them and protecting them, as well as leading them by a glorious cloud all that time; which doth well enough agree with what follows. (See ii. 7.)

To humble thee.] Or, to afflict thee with tedious wanderings up and down, backward and forward, without any certain dwelling-place.

And prove thee.] To try whether they would be better, by being kept so long out of the good land promised unto them.

And to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep his commandments, or no.] God knew perfectly how they were disposed towards him; but it was fit, that they should know themselves better, and posterity be instructed by their behaviour.

Ver. 3. And he humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger.] He afflicted thee, by suffering thee to want bread to eat, (Exod. xvi. 2, 3.)

And fed thee with manna.] But it was that he might have an opportunity to make a bountiful provision for such a vast multitude of people, as were fed by him every day from heaven, and teach them to depend on his good providence.

Which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know.] Exod. xvi. 15. He made an unusual, as well as an unexpected provision for them.

That he might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only.] That it is not only our common food that preserves us.

But by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God doth man live.] But by any thing whatsoever (for so word often signifies) which God shall please to command to give us nourishment. This was a wonderful encouragement to obedience, that God would rather work a miracle, than suffer them to want necessaries; and by a light aerial sort of bread, give them as great strength and vigour, as the most solid nourishment was wont to afford them. The remembrance of which could not but excite their posterity to love God, and serve him, if they often and seriously reflected on it.

Ver. 4. Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell, these forty years.] These were two other wonderful benefits, which, if well considered, could not but incline them to be obedient to him, who multiplied miracles to nourish and strengthen their faith and hope in him. The Jews, to increase the miracle, say, their clothes enlarged as they grew bigger, from children to men; and so did their shoes also: but there was no need of this; for the clothes and shoes of those men that died might serve their children when they grew up to their stature. And it was sufficiently amazing, without such additions, that their clothes should not so much as decay, nor their feet, by so long travelling in hot and stony places, have the least swelling in them, or, as some translate it, grow callous. There are those that refer this last clause not to their feet, but to their shoes; according to what we read, xxix. 5.

Ver. 5. Thou shalt also consider in thine heart.] Often reflect and ponder.

That as a man chasteneth his son, so the Lord thy God chasteneth thee.] All the afflictions which God had sent upon them, he would have them think, were not for their undoing, but for their amendment, and correcting what was amiss in them; and therefore ought to be thankfully acknowledged as well as his benefits.

Ver. 6. Therefore thou shalt keep the commandments of the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, and to fear him.] Howsoever therefore he dealt with them, it ought to have led them to obedience. In the repetition of this so often, Moses doth but practise his own lesson, which he had taught them, vi. 7. that they should teach these words diligently to their children, &c.

Ver. 7. For the Lord thy God bringeth thee into a good land.] Therefore there was the greater need they should enter into it with the pious resolution beforementioned, to fear God and walk in his ways. Otherwise, they would be in great danger to be corrupted by such plenty and variety of all good things as this land afforded.

A land of brooks of water, of fountains, and depths that spring out of valleys and hills.] The Hebrew word tehom, which we translate deep, and in the plural number depths, signifies sometimes those great caverns of water that are within the ground, which were made by the plentiful rains, which God sent upon this country while they were obedient to him; which both made it fruitful (though now barren), and abounding also with water for their cattle, (Psal. lxxviii. 15. Ezek. xxxi. 4.) But it is here commonly interpreted lakes, or wells of water.

Ver. 8. A land of wheat, and barley, and vines, and fig-trees, and pomegranates.] Plentifully stored with all things necessary for the support and pleasure of life.

A land of oil, olive, and honey.] The same word debas, which signifies honey, signifies also dates. And so De Dieu thinks it most reasonable to translate it here, being joined with four other sorts of fruits; and so Kimchi saith, the ancient Jews expounded it in this place, and in 2 Chron. xxxi. 5. where it is said, that Israel brought in abundance, the first-fruits of corn, wine, oil, and honey, or dates, as we there translate it in the margin.

Ver. 9. A land wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarceness.] Be in no want of any sort of provision, which is comprehended under the name of bread.

Thou shalt not lack any thing in it.] No other conveniences of life.

A land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass.] Where there are useful minerals, as plentiful as stones are in other places. These are the rather mentioned, because there were no such mines in Egypt, where they had long dwelt, and were stored with plenty of other things, (Numb. xi. 5.)

Ver. 10. When thou hast eaten, and art full.] After a liberal meal.

Then thou shalt bless the Lord thy God for the good land which he hath given thee.] Give solemn thanks to God, not only for that present repast, but for the plentiful provision he had made for them of all good things, in the land he had bestowed on them. From this place the Jews have made it a general rule, or as they call it an affirmative precept, that every one bless God at their meals, that is, as I said, give him thanks for his benefits: for he blesses us when he bestows good things upon us; and we bless him when we thankfully acknowledge his goodness therein: which is a natural duty which we owe to the Fountain and Original of all good.

Ver. 11. Beware that thou forget not the Lord thy God, in not keeping his commandments, and his judgments, and his statutes, which I command thee this day.] He would have their thanksgiving for his benefits leave such a sense of God upon their minds, as should make them careful to yield him an entire obedience.

Ver. 12. Lest when thou hast eaten, and art full, and hast built goodly houses, and dwelt therein.] Feasted in stately houses, wherein they enjoyed their ease.

Ver. 13. And when thy herds and thy flocks are multiplied, and thy silver and thy gold is multiplied, and all that thou hast is multiplied.] The sense of these two verses is, when they had great abundance of all good things within doors and without.

Ver. 14. Then thine heart be lifted up.] Which is an usual effect of great riches; as Euripides observes in that known saying of his, Ὕβριν δὲ τίκτει πλοῦτος, wealth breeds pride, scorn, and contempt of others. This Moses Kotzensis thought so great a sin, that he puts it among the negative precepts; and pretends he was warned in a dream so to do, though Maimonides, and others, had omitted it. And when he awaked, he was confirmed in it, by reading a place in the Gemara upon Sota, (cap. 1,) which saith, wheresoever we find these words in Scripture, take heed lest, there is a prohibition, as there is, ver. 11. and here, to take heed of pride: for whosoever is proud, he shall be brought low, as the Gemara there adds; which are, in a manner, the words of our blessed Saviour, (St. Luke xviii. 14.)

And thou forget the Lord thy God.] This is another common effect of large possessions, which make the owners of them fall into sloth and luxury, and such forgetfulness of the Donor of all good things, that they trust in uncertain riches (as the apostle speaks), and not in the living God, imagining now they can never want; not because God is so good, but because they have such store of good things laid up for many years.

Which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt, and from the house of bondage.] No wonder if they forgot all his former benefits, when they were unthankful for the present.

Ver. 15. Who led thee through that great and terrible wilderness.] See i. 19.

Wherein were fiery serpents.] See Numb. xxi. 6.

And scorpions.] These are commonly joined with serpents in Scripture, even in the New Testament, (Luke x. 19. xi. 12, 13.) being found in the same places, especially in this desert of Arabia.

And drought.] The Hebrew word tsimmaon signifies a dry place, as we translate it, Psal. cvii. 33. Isa. xxxv. 7. And that best agrees with what here follows, where there was no water.

Who brought thee forth water out of a rock of flint.] From which one would have sooner expected fire than water, (Numb. xx. 11.)

Who fed thee in the wilderness with manna, which thy fathers knew not.] Ver. 3. The great Salmasius, in a treatise on purpose about manna, hath said a great deal to prove that the manna which God sent the Jews did not differ in its form or substance from that which commonly fell in those countries, and doth so at this day: but herein consisted the miracle, that he gave them in a prescribed measure, and so abundantly, as to suffice such a vast number; and that every morning, in all seasons of the year. This made it a Divine manna; for the common fell only in small quantities, and not always, but at some times in the year.

That he might humble thee.] This word is commonly understood of humbling by affliction; which may seem not to belong to manna; for that was a singular benefit, being an excellent nourishment, and of a delicious taste: but they, having nothing else besides this to live upon, were soon tired with it, (as we find Numb. xi. 6.) And much more did it seem an affliction to them, to live upon one thing alone for forty years together; and God intended by it to humble them, at the same time that he was extraordinary kind to them.

And that he might prove thee.] Whether they would be thankful that they were not starved, and submit to his wise providence, and obey his laws; which they had the greater reason to observe, because it was evident they owed their very life and being to him every moment: for without new supplies every day from heaven, they had been famished in that desolate wilderness.

And do the good at thy latter end.] That in conclusion his kindness to them might be more thankfully received, and more safely enjoyed. So Maimonides expounds this passage, in his More Nevochim, (par. iii. cap. 24.) "God was pleased to accustom them to labour in the wilderness, that he might increase their happiness when they came into the land of Canaan. For this is certain, a transition from labour to rest is far sweeter than continual rest. Nor could they so easily have subdued the land, and overcome the inhabitants of it, unless they had endured some hardship in the wilderness. For rest and idleness take away men's courage; but labour and hard fare augments it. And this is the good (saith he) which was in the issue to redound to them by this wise dispensation of God's providence."

Ver. 17. And thou shalt say in thine heart, My power, and the might of my hand, hath gotten me this wealth.] Such vain conceits are apt to arise in men's minds, if they preserve not a sense of God, and of all his mercies to them.

Ver. 18. But thou shalt remember the Lord thy God; for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth.] Continually call to mind that they owed all they had, and the increase of it, to his almighty providence; without whom they could never have gotten possession of this land, nor have prospered in it.

That he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, &c.] He would have them sensible of their own unworthiness also (which would make them more grateful to him) of all the blessings God had bestowed on them, and acknowledge them to his mere goodness, and fidelity to his promises; for they had been a murmuring and rebellious people.

Ver. 19. And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the Lord thy God.] Luxury and pride (the usual effects of fulness) naturally made them unthankful and unmindful of God: and neglect of God's service made them easily fall to idolatry.

And walk after other gods, and worship and serve them.] The two last expressions are the explication of the first; for then they walked after the idols of the people (as Onkelos paraphrases it), when they worshipped and adored them. It is evident by this, that the drift of Moses, in all this discourse, is (as I observed before) to press upon them the first and great commandment.

I testify against you this day, that ye shall utterly perish.] See iv. 26.

Ver. 20. As the nations which the Lord destroyeth before your face.] He speaks in the present tense, because he was about to destroy them: and when he began, he destroyed them by little and little, (vii. 22.) and there were still more to be destroyed.

So shall ye perish, because ye would not be obedient to the voice of the Lord your God.] It was but just that they should perish as those nations did, because they fell into their sin.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. HEAR, O Israel.] He begins a new exhortation to them, at some distance of time from the former, but still aiming at the same thing, to represent to them the danger of idolatry.

Thou art to pass over Jordan this day.] That is, shortly, not long hence; for it cannot be meant precisely: all these things being spoken in the eleventh month of the last year of their travels, and they passed not over Jordan till the first month of the next year. Between which and this time Moses died, and they mourned a whole month for him.

To go in to possess nations.] A country inhabited by nations; for the people themselves they were to destroy.

Greater and mightier than thyself.] Whom notwithstanding God would deliver up into their hands.

Cities great, and fenced up to heaven.] As the spies had represented them, (i. 28.) And they were, indeed, very strong cities, whose walls could not easily be scaled.

Ver. 2. A people great and tall.] See Numb. xiv. 28. 32.

The children of the Anakims, whom thou knowest.] Who seem to have been the chief of those Nephilim or Rephaim (which we sometimes translate giants) in those parts, (Numb. xiii. 22. 28. 33.)

Of whom thou hast heard say, Who can stand before the children of Anak?] A common proverb in those days. The children of Anak being so famous, that the whole nation (as Bochartus thinks) took its name from them. For Bene-Anak (i. e. children of Anak), or Pheneanak, is easily changed into Phœnicia. These Anakims were vanquished by Joshua, who drove them out of the cities where they dwelt, and made them flee to the Philistines. Where a remnant of them seemed to have lived till the days of David. For Goliath, and his brethren Lahmi, Sippai, and Ishbibanob, (1 Chron. xx. 4, &c.) were Anakims; and so was that man with six toes on each foot, and six fingers on each hand, (2 Sam. xxi. 16.) for they were all born at Gath; which was one of the cities to which the Anakims fled, (Josh. xi. 22.) Some think that from hence kings, among the Greeks, were called Ἄνακτες, because commonly they chose those to rule over them who were persons of a great stature, and carried majesty in their faces. But it is not improbable (as I observed before) that some of the Anakims fled into Greece, and settled there, when they were driven out of Canaan.

Ver. 3. Understand therefore this day.] Settle this therefore in your minds, before you go over Jordan, as undoubted truth.

That the Lord thy God is he that goeth before thee.] Over Jordan, (Josh. iii. 3, 4, &c.)

As a consuming fire.] Before whom none can stand, (iv. 24.)

He shall destroy them, and he shall bring them down before thy face.] See Josh. iii. 10, 11. The Hebrews have a conceit, that the fire which burnt upon the altar appeared in the form of a lion; to shew what God would be to their enemies, if the Israelites obeyed him; otherwise, what he would be to them.

So shalt thou drive them out, and destroy them utterly, as the Lord hath said unto thee.] Not the whole seven nations entirely; whom he said God would drive out by little and little, (vii. 22.) but so many, as to make a settlement for themselves in Canaan without much difficulty.

Ver. 4. Speak not in thine heart, after that the Lord thy God hath cast them out.] When this is done, do not so much as entertain a thought.

For my righteousness hath the Lord brought me in to possess this land.] Nothing is more dangerous than pride and self-conceit; and therefore, as he taught them before (viii. 7.) to have an humble opinion of their own power, so now not to arrogate any thing to themselves, on the account of their own righteousness.

But for the wickedness of these nations the Lord doth drive them out from before thee.] Lev. xviii. 24, 25. 27, 28.

Ver. 5. Not for thy righteousness, or the uprightness of thine heart, dost thou go to possess their land; but for the wickedness of these nations, &c. and that he may perform the word which the Lord sware unto thy fathers, &c.] It was of great moment (which makes him repeat it again) that they should understand the true causes why God expelled these nations, and gave their land to the Israelites; which were these two: first, the abominable wickedness of the Canaanites; for which they deserved to be rooted: secondly, God's gracious promises to the pious ancestors of the Israelites, with whom he made a covenant, and confirmed it with an oath, to plant them there, in the room of the former inhabitants.

Ver. 6. Understand therefore, that the Lord thy God giveth thee not this good land to possess it for thy righteousness.] He repeats it a third time, that, if it were possible, he might root out of the Israelites the opinion of their own deserts, before he rooted the Canaanites out of their country.

For thou art a stiff-necked people.] So far from being righteous, that they were very refractory. Of which God often complained, (Exod. xxxii. 9. xxxiii. 3. 5.) and Moses acknowledges it in his prayer to God for them, (xxxiv. 9.)

Ver. 7. Remember, and forget not, how thou provokedst the Lord thy God to wrath in the wilderness.] In order to destroy the opinion of their own righteousness, it was necessary to call to mind some of their most notorious provocations; which he exhorts them carefully to preserve in their mind, as a means to keep them humble.

From the day that thou didst depart out of the land of Egypt, until you came to this place, ye have been rebellious against the Lord.] This appears by the many murmurings we read of in the two first years after they came out of Egypt, and likewise in the last; of which only we have a particular account: but their behaviour, all the rest of the time they spent in the wilderness, was no better.

Ver. 8. Also in Horeb ye provoked the Lord to wrath.] Or rather, even in Horeb (for there is an emphasis in this, and he speaks it with some indignation); when they had newly received the law, and had a visible appearance of God in great glory upon Mount Sinai, and had entered into covenant with him, they so shamefully revolted from him, that he thought to have destroyed them, (Exod. xxxii. 7, 8, &c.)

Ver. 9. When I was gone up into the mount to receive the tables of stone, even the tables of the covenant which the Lord made with you.] See Exod. xxiv. 11.

Then I abode in the mount forty days and forty nights; I neither did eat bread, nor drink water.] See Exod. xxiv. 18. xxxiv. 28.

Ver. 10. And the Lord delivered unto me two tables of stone, written with the finger of God.] See Exod. xxxi. 18.

According to all the words which the Lord spake with you in the mount.] See Exod. xxxiv. 28.

Out of the midst of the fire, in the day of the assembly.] When the whole body of the people were assembled, and heard God speak these ten words out of the midst of the fire. (See Deut. iv. 10—13.)

Ver. 11. And it came to pass at the end of forty days and forty nights, that the Lord gave me the two tables of stone, &c.] That is, having given him the two tables, as was said before, ver. 10.

Ver. 12. The Lord said unto me.] Immediately after he had delivered to him the tables, (Exod. xxxi. 18. xxxii. 7.)

Arise, get thee down quickly from hence; for the people which thou hast brought forth out of Egypt have corrupted themselves, &c.] See Exod. xxxii. 7, 8.

Ver. 13. Furthermore the Lord spake unto me, saying, I have seen this people, and, behold, it is a stiff-necked people.] Who will not bend to the yoke of my laws, (Exod. xxxii. 9.)

Ver. 14. Let me alone.] Do not make any intercession to me for them.

That I may destroy them, and blot out their name from under heaven; and I will make of thee a nation greater and mightier than they.] See Exod. xxxii. 10.

Ver. 15. So I turned, and came down from the mount.] See Exod. xxxii. 15.

And the mount burnt with fire.] Was all in a flame, in token of God's high displeasure against them; and as if he intended presently to consume them.

And the two tables of the covenant were in my hand.] Exod. xxxii. 15.

Ver. 16. And I looked, and behold, ye had sinned against the Lord your God, and had made you a molten calf.] About which he found them dancing, (Exod. xxxii. 19.)

Ye had turned aside quickly out of the way which the Lord had commanded you.] For a few weeks before he had commanded them, with his own mouth, not to make to themselves any graven image, &c. (Exod. xx. 4.) And immediately after commanded Moses to repeat this precept particularly to them, "Not to make with him gods of silver or gold," (ver. 22, 23.)

Ver. 17. And I took the two tables, and cast them out of my two hands, and brake them before your eyes.] By God's order, no doubt, in token that they had broken his covenant, and were unworthy to be owned by him for his people, (Exod. xxxii. 19.) or that the covenant was made void, and God no longer engaged to them.

Ver. 18. And I fell down.] To pray God for pardon; though not presently: but after he had broken the calf in pieces, reproved Aaron, and made a slaughter among the people, (Exod. xxxii. 20, 21, &c.)

As at the first.] When he first heard of their sin, Exod. xxxii. 11—13. and the next morning after he had broken the calf, and done execution upon the offenders, (ver. 30—32.)

Forty days and forty nights: I did neither eat bread nor drink water.] Exod. xxxiv. 2. 28.

Because of all your sins which ye sinned, in doing wickedly in the sight of the Lord, to provoke him to anger.] He spent this time, very much, in earnest supplication to God, to forgive not only this, but all other sins, whereby they had deserved to be cast off by him. For they provoked him at Marah, (Exod. xv. 23.) and in the wilderness of Sin, (xvi. 2, 3.) and at Massah, (xvii. 2—4.)

Ver. 19. For I was afraid of the anger and hot displeasure wherewith the Lord was wroth against you, to destroy you.] Which God had expressed both before he came down from the mount and after, (Exod. xxxii. xxxiii. 3. 5.) Insomuch, that the Lord removed out of the camp; and would not, for the present, dwell among them, (ver. 7.)

But the Lord hearkened unto me at that time also.] See Exod. xxxiv. 8—10. where the Lord tells him, he expected they should be more faithful hereafter, in observing their covenant with him, particularly this part, of worshipping no other God. (See there, ver. 10—14.)

Ver. 20. And the Lord was very angry with Aaron, to have destroyed him, &c.] This shews the heinousness of this sin, which had like to have cost Aaron his life; though he merely complied with the impetuous desire of the people, out of fear and want of courage to resist them.

Ver. 21. And I took your sin.] So idols are termed in Isa. xxxi. 7. The object or occasion of sin, as well as the punishment of it, being called by the name of sin.

The calf which you had made, and burnt it with fire, and stamped it, and ground it very small, &c.] This he did before he went up the second time into the mount, (Exod. xxxii. 20.)

And I cast the dust thereof into the brook that descended out of the mount.] From the rock which Moses smote with his rod, (Exod. xvii. 6.) which constantly supplied them with drink; which for the present they could not have but mixed with their sin, as we read Exod. xxxii. 20.

Ver. 22. And at Taberah.] Besides this great sin committed at Horeb, he puts them in mind of several other, that they might be more humbled, and have no opinion of their own righteousness remaining in them. (See concerning this, Numb. xi. 1—3.)

And at Massah.] As the foregoing sin was committed after the making the golden calf, so this was before it, (Exod. xvii. 7.)

And at Kibroth-hattaavah ye provoked the Lord to wrath.] This provocation was immediately after that at Taberah, (Numb. xi. 33, 34.) All which three places had their names from the sin of the Israelites, or from their punishment.

Ver. 23. Likewise.] And yet this was not all.

When the Lord sent you from Kadesh-barnea, saying, Go up, and possess the land which I have given you.] Numb. xiii. 1—3.

Then ye rebelled against the commandment of the Lord your God; and ye believed him not, nor hearkened to his word.] Numb. xiv. 1—3. of which unbelief God there complains, ver. 11.

Ver. 24. Ye have been rebellious against the Lord from the day that I knew you.] To comprise all in a few words, you have been a disobedient people ever since I was acquainted with you. So he suspected they would prove, (Exod. iv. 1.) and upon the first disappointment found it to be true, (Exod. v. 24, 25.)

Ver. 25. Thus I fell down before the Lord forty days and forty nights, as I fell down at the first; because the Lord had said he would destroy you.] Having interposed some other instances of their rebellious disposition, besides their making the golden calf, he returns to what he had begun to say concerning his intercession with God for a pardon; which he could not obtain without long importunity. For we cannot from these words gather, as some of the Jews do, that Moses was three times in the mount forty days and forty nights; it being plain, that he speaks here of the same time which he mentioned ver. 18. And if we should think he intended any other, we might conclude he was four times in the mount so many days and nights, because he mentions it over again in the next chapter, x. 10.

Because the Lord had said he would destroy you.] Exod. xxxii. 10. xxxiii. 5. This made him so earnest to obtain an assurance from God, that he would continue to be as gracious to them as he had been: of which he had given him some hope before he went up into the mount. (See Exod. xxiii. 17. xxxiv. 9, 10.)

Ver. 26. I prayed therefore unto the Lord, and said, O Lord God, destroy not thy people, and thine inheritance, which thou hast redeemed through thy greatness, &c.] He used the same argument in his petition for them, when he went into the mount the second time, which he had urged before he came down the first time from it, (Exod. xxxii. 12.)

Ver. 27. Remember thy servants, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.] The very same he had said there, ver. 13.

And look not unto the stubbornness of this people, nor to their wickedness, nor to their sin.] He prays that the gracious promise of God to their pious forefathers would move him to overlook the high provocations of their posterity. Which he aggravates in several words, the more to humble them, and to magnify God's mercy in granting them a pardon. The word stubbornness seems to relate to their very evil disposition of mind; and their wickedness to all their undutiful murmurings; and their sin to their idolatry; which is often called in Scripture peculiarly by the name of sin: it being the highest provocation, from whence sprang all manner of wickedness. Thus Jeroboam is said to have made Israel to sin, by setting up the calves at Dan and Bethel to be worshipped.

Ver. 28. Lest the land whence thou broughtest them out say, Because the Lord was not able to bring them into the land which he promised them, and because he hated them, he hath brought them out to slay them in the wilderness.] The sense of this also he had before urged, (Exod. xxxii. 12.)

Ver. 29. Yet they are thy people, and thine inheritance, which thou broughtest out by thy mighty power, &c.] They were redeemed by him out of the land of Egypt, and, after a wonderful manner, separated from all other people, to be his peculiar, (Exod. xix. 4—6.) And besides, having repented of this sin in making the golden calf, God had again owned them to be his, and promised his presence should go with them, (Exod. xxxiii. 14.) Insomuch, that Moses there saith, before he went into the mount again, (ver. 13.) "Consider that this nation is thy people." And see ver. 15, 16.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1. AT that time the Lord said unto me, Hew thee two tables of stone like unto the first, and come up unto me into the mount.] After his anger was something appeased, he ordered Moses to come up to him where he had been before, and bring with him two tables of stone like those he had broken, that God might renew his covenant with them. But there was this difference, (as I observed Exod. xxxiv. 1.) that God himself made the former tables, but he bade Moses make these: which signifies some abatement of his favour.

And make thee an ark of wood.] This command was given at his first going up into the mount, (Exod. xxv. 10.) and, perhaps, was renewed again now, upon the occasion of making these new tables which were to be put into it.

Ver. 2. And I will write on the tables the words that were in the first tables which thou brakest.] So we read he told him, Exod. xxxiv. 1.

And thou shalt put them in the ark.] As soon as it was made to receive them.

Ver. 3. And I made an ark of shittim-wood.] This looks as if he made an ark before he made the tables; that when he brought them down, it might be ready to receive them. And it hath given some ground to the Jewish doctors, to say that there were two arks; one made by Moses, wherein he put the tables of stone that were broken, and those that were renewed, until the other was made by Bezaleel: for we read expressly, that Bezaleel made the ark, Exod. xxxvii. 1. and here it is said that Moses made it. So that they conclude there were two made; and this made by Moses they fancy was the ark that went before them in their marches and battles; which the other never did by God's order, but only when they entered into Canaan; (Josh. iii.) for when of their ownselves they carried it forth in the days of Eli, God was angry with them, and delivered it into the enemy's hand, (1 Sam. iv. 3, 4. 11.) But Aben Ezra, Nachmanides, and Abarbinel, have confuted this by strong reasons to the contrary, as may be seen in Buxtorf's Histor. Arcæ, p. 35, 36, &c. And as to this place, they are of opinion, that Moses speaks of the ark made afterward by Bezaleel, which Moses is said to have made, because he commanded him to make it. Just as Solomon is said to have built the temple, because he caused it to be built. Or, if it be granted that Moses made an ark before he went the second time into the mount (which this verse seems to countenance), it will not follow that there were two arks in use among the Israelites; for this ark now made was of mere wood, not overlaid with gold, and designed only as a chest wherein to keep the tables handsomely, till the ark could be made by Bezaleel, and then the tables were translated into that, and this chest of Moses laid aside.

And hewed two tables of stone like unto the first, and went up into the mount.] See Exod. xxxiv. 4.

Ver. 4. And he wrote on the tables, according to the first writing, the ten commandments.] Exod. xxxiv. 28.

Which the Lord commanded you in the mount, out of the midst of the fire, in the day of the assembly.] When the whole congregation was gathered together at the foot of the mount. (See ix. 10.)

And the Lord gave them unto me.] To carry down to the people.

Ver. 5. And I turned myself.] From the Divine presence, where he had been supplicating for mercy, and had received from thence the tables of the covenant.

And came down from the mount.] At the end of forty days and nights, (Exod. xxxiv. 28, 29.)

And put the tables in the ark which I had made.] Which he commanded to be made by Bezaleel, (Exod. xxxvii. 1.) and put into the tabernacle as soon as it was built, with these tables in it, (Exod. xl. 20, 21.)

And there they be, as the Lord commanded me.] Though Moses mentions his making the ark before his hewing the tables, and going up into the mount, (ver. 3.) yet these words seem to determine that he speaks of the ark made by Bezaleel, according to his directions. For now that they were going over Jordan, the tables were in the ark, which he is said here to have made. Which was certainly the ark of the covenant, not that chest, which some suppose Moses to have made to keep the tables in till the other could be fitted for their reception.

Ver. 6. And the children of Israel took their journey from Beeroth, of the children of Jaakan, to Mosera.] Not immediately; but after they had passed through several other places, and made some stay in them: for they went from Bene-Jaakan to Gudgodah (or Hor-hagidgad), and so to Jotbath, and the rest of the mansions mentioned Numb. xxxiii. 32, 33, &c. until they came to Mount Hor.

There Aaron died, and there he was buried.] At Mosera, or the top of Mount Hor; which was another part of the same mountain, as Horeb was of Sinai.

And Eleazar his son ministered in the priest's office in his stead.] The greatest difficulty is to give anaccount how this comes in here, and what connexion this and the following verse have with what went before. All the satisfaction that I can give to it is this, that Moses having told them, that he put the tables of the testimony or covenant into the ark, as a token God was reconciled to them, and that there they still were as the Lord commanded, he puts them out of all doubt of it, by telling them, that though Aaron (who had the special care of the holy place, and all things in it committed to him) was dead, yet Eleazar his son was still alive, who could testify those holy things remained, as when Moses first placed them there, he being consecrated to the priest's office instead of Aaron, and in this very mount, (Numb. xx. 25, 26, &c.) which is the occasion of mentioning this station here, when most of the rest are omitted.

Ver. 7. And from thence.] Not from Mosera, but from Bene-Jaakan, as appears from Numb. xxxiii. 32. where a full account is given of their removals, which are but just touched here.

They journeyed to Gudgodah.] Called in the book of Numbers by the name of Hor-hagidgad. And none will think it strange that there is such variation in the proper names of places and of men, in profane writers, as well as the Scriptures, who considers (as Conradus Pellicanus here notes) how differently the names of places are pronounced now, from what they were in former ages; and how much one nation differs from another, when they speak of them; and what alterations are made from the first founders of nations and cities by those that conquer them, and change all names to their own glory. See how names were changed among the Israelites in no long time, Numb. xxvi. 15—17. 23, 24. 35. 38, 39, &c.

And from Gudgodah to Jotbath.] And so to the rest of the places mentioned Numb. xxxiii. 34—36. till they came to Mount Hor.

A land of rivers of waters.] A place where there was plenty of water; which he mentions, I suppose, that they might reflect upon their foul distrust of God's providence a little after, when they murmured for want of water at Kadesh, (Numb. xx. 3, 4, &c.)

Ver. 8. At that time.] Not long after Moses came down from the mount the second time; of which he had been speaking, ver. 5.

The Lord separated the tribe of Levi.] To his own special service, as we read Numb. iii. Some think that God renewed his choice of them to the employment here mentioned after Aaron's death, when he confirmed them in their office. But we read of no such thing; and it cannot be inferred merely from these words, at that time, which may well relate to the time mentioned, ver. 5.

To bear the ark of the covenant of the Lord.] Here are three parts of their office mentioned in these and the following words. The first of which was to carry the ark; which peculiarly belonged to the Kohathites, (Numb. iii. 27. 31.) when the camp removed from one place to another. Who were good witnesses that the same ark still remained at that day wherein Moses first placed the tables of the covenant; for it never stirred but by their means.

To stand before the Lord.] This is a phrase used of servants that wait upon their masters, before whom they are said to stand. Thus Gehazi attended the prophet Elisha, (2 Kings v. 25.) And the prophets themselves are thus said to stand before the Lord, (1 Kings xvii. 1. xviii. 15.) Therefore it here signifies that the Levites were separated to be God's ministers, as it follows.

To minister unto him.] As assistants to the priests in the tabernacle, (Numb. iii. 6.) and as a guard to the tabernacle, (ver. 7, 8.) Which was the second part of their office.

And to bless in his name unto this day.] This was the greatest thing of all, and was peculiar to the priests, who were a part of the tribe of Levi, but had the sole privilege among them to bless in the name of the Lord, as we read expressly Numb. vi. 23, 24. If, indeed, it could be made out, that by blessing in the name of the Lord, is meant only to bless the name of the Lord, that was common to all the Levites, who sang praises and gave thanks continually to him in the temple, as I suppose they did in the tabernacle: but I find no example of the use of this expression in this sense; and therefore it must be restrained to the priests, who were sons of Levi, as well as the rest; and are so called when Moses mentions this part of their office, Deut. xxi. 5.

Ver. 9. Wherefore Levi hath no part nor inheritance with his brethren.] Because God would have them only attend to this service, and not look after other affairs; particularly of guarding the sanctuary, and keeping constant watch there, to secure all the holy things, especially the ark, which they took care none should meddle withal. And therefore the people might be sure it remained as Moses left it, when he put it into the tabernacle with the tables of the covenant in it.

The Lord is his inheritance, according as the Lord thy God promised him.] He took care to provide for the Levites, without having any land to plough or sow, &c. (See Numb. xviii. 20.)

Ver. 10. And I stayed in the mount, according to the first time, forty days and forty nights.] This doth not signify, that after the separation of the Levites he went up again into the mount, but having confirmed what he said concerning his putting the tables of stone in the ark, which he made after he came the second time down from the mount, (ver. 5.) he returns to what he was speaking of in the beginning of the chapter, and had begun to say before, (ix. 25.) how he prayed to God for them, when he went to carry the tables he had hewn up unto God in the mount, that now he might relate to them the success of his prayers, which follows in the next words.

And the Lord hearkened unto me at that time also, and the Lord would not destroy thee.] As he feared he would, because he had so threatened, ix. 15.

Ver. 11. And the Lord said unto me, Arise, take thy journey before the people, that they may go in, and possess the land, &c.] This cannot refer to what he said unto him after the making the golden calf, (as I find some take it from Exod. xxxiii. 1.) for that was before he went up into the mount again; but to what he said at the conclusion of their removals from place to place, (some of which he mentions here, ver. 6, 7.) for then he orders them what to do when they entered into Canaan, which, he saith, I have given you to possess it, (Numb. xxxii. 51—53.)

Ver. 12. And now, Israel, what doth the Lord thy God require of thee?] Unto whom he hath given tables, wherein he himself hath wrote his will with his own hand, (ver. 4, 5.) and hath graciously pardoned your foul breach of his covenant upon my intercession, (ver. 10.)

But to fear the Lord thy God.] The fear of God sometimes includes in it all religion; but here seems to signify one of the great principles of obedience. (See vi. 2.)

And to walk in all his ways.] Unto which the fear of God inclines men, when their hearts are possessed with it.

And to love him.] Especially if the love of God be in them; which is still a stronger principle of obedience, (vi. 1.)

And to serve the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul.] Being constant in his worship and service, and worshipping him alone, (vi. 13. xiii. 3.) For loving him with all the heart and soul, seems here to have particular respect to their having no inclination to serve other gods, (1 Kings viii. 23. 48.) Which the Jews, after they had smarted for their idolatry, understood to be the great commandment. As their father Jacob, they say, taught his twelve sons, when they came about him on his death-bed, saying to them: "Ye perhaps worship the idols which Terah, the father of Abraham, worshipped; or those which Laban, my mother's brother, worshipped; or ye worship the God of Jacob. To whom they all made this answer, with a perfect fear: Hear, O Israel, our father, The Lord our God is one Lord. Whereupon Jacob said, Let his great name be blessed for ever." Thus the Jerusalem Targum upon vi. 4. of this book.

Ver. 13. To keep the commandments of the Lord, and his statutes, which I command this day for thy good.] Self-love should have inclined them to obedience to God's commands, which he gave them for their good; though he rewarded their obedience to them, as if he had received the benefit thereof.

Ver. 14. Behold, the heaven.] Where the sun, moon, and stars shine.

And the heaven of heavens.] And all the glorious regions beyond them.

Is the Lord's thy God.] Are all his possession, as they are his work.

The earth also, with all that therein is.] As well as this earth, and all the creatures that are in it.

Ver. 15. Only the Lord had a delight in thy fathers to love them, and he chose their seed after them, even you above all people, &c.] He would have them sensible, therefore, that the Possessor of heaven and of earth could have no need of them, or of their services, who were a very inconsiderable part of his creatures: but it was his own mere good-will and pleasure which moved him to shew such love to Abraham, as he had done, and to his posterity for his sake, above all other nations on earth.

Ver. 16. Circumcise therefore the foreskin of your heart.] Do not satisfy yourselves therefore with the bare circumcision of your flesh (and the observance of such external rites and ceremonies), but cut off and cast away all your naughty affections, which make you insensible both of God's mercies and corrections, and disobedient to his commands.

And be no more stiff-necked.] As he had often before complained they were, particularly Exod. xxxii. 9. and see ix. 6. of this book. It is a metaphor, as I observed, from oxen, who, when they are to draw in a yoke, and go forward, pull back their neck and their shoulder to withdraw themselves from the yoke. To both which the Scripture alludes, Nehem. ix. 29. And sometime severally we find mention of them, as in the place beforenamed in Exodus, he speaks of their stiff-neck; and Zachar. vii. 11. he saith, "they pulled away the shoulder." St. Stephen puts both these together in his character of the wicked Jews that killed our blessed Saviour, Acts vii. 51. that they were stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart. Therefore the contrary disposition God promises towards the conclusion of this book, as the greatest blessing he could bestow on them, (xxx. 6.)

Ver. 17. For the Lord thy God is God of gods, and Lord of lords.] Superior to all other beings, whether kings on earth or angels in heaven.

A great God, a mighty, and a terrible.] Who can do what he pleases every where; and therefore is to be greatly dreaded.

Which regardeth not persons, nor taketh reward.] The most righteous judge of men, who will not connive at your sins because you are circumcised, nor be bribed by any sacrifices to overlook your wickedness, (Exod. xxiii. 8. Lev. xix. 15. Deut. i. 17.) nor, on the contrary, reject those that uprightly obey him, though they be not Jews. So St. Peter learnt to understand these words, Acts x. 34.

Ver. 18. He doth execute the judgment of the fatherless and widow.] Takes their part, as we speak, and defends them against those that would oppress them.

And loveth the stranger, in giving him food and raiment.] Provideth for those who are driven unjustly out of their own country, or, travelling on their honest occasions, fall into want; for he seems here to speak of those who were neither proselytes of justice, nor of the gate, as the Jews speak, but were mere gentiles.

Ver. 19. Love ye therefore the stranger.] Be kind and hospitable to such distressed persons: which is a virtue that flows from the love of God, (ver. 12.) to which it is in vain to pretend, if we love not all mankind. This love consists in imitating God's care of such persons, whereof he speaks in the foregoing verse, viz. doing them justice equally with others, and affording them food and raiment.

For ye were strangers in the land of Egypt.] This virtue was peculiarly required of the Jews; who had been in that condition, which he commanded them to pity. (See Exod. xxiii. 9. Levit. xix. 33, 34.) And if they had sincerely practised this duty towards aliens, the grace of God shewn to the gentiles in our blessed Saviour, would not have seemed so strange to them as it did.

Ver. 20. Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God, him shalt thou serve.] This was explained before, ver. 12.

To him shalt thou cleave.] Serve, that is, and worship none but him.

And swear by his name.] See vi. 13.

Ver. 21. He is thy praise.] Whom thou oughtest therefore to praise; or rather, in whose love and favour thou oughtest to glory; and to think it the highest honour to be his servant, and to have him for thy God, as it here follows.

He is thy God.] Who hath bestowed upon thee all the good things which thou enjoyest.

That hath done for thee all these great and terrible things which thine eyes have seen.] In bringing them out of Egypt, destroying Pharaoh in the Red Sea, leading them through the wilderness, giving them the country of Sihon and Og, &c. Whom therefore they were bound to love and serve, and to confide in his mercy, and not in their own power or righteousness, (viii. 17, 18. ix. 4—6.)

Ver. 22. Thy fathers went down into Egypt with threescore and ten persons.] See Gen. xlvi. 27. Exod. i. 5. Their family, he would have them remember, was very small about two hundred years ago.

And now the Lord thy God hath made thee as the stars of heaven for multitude.] Vastly increased them, according to his promise unto Abraham, Gen. xv. 5. Exod. xii. 37. Numb. xxvi. 51. 62. Which alone (as Conradus Pellicanus here notes) was sufficient to fill their hearts with his love, and their mouths with his praise.

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 1. THEREFORE thou shalt love the Lord thy God.] Who of so small hath made thee so great a nation.

And keep his charge.] A phrase used frequently concerning the Levites, Numb. iii. 7, 8, &c. But here comprehends all the particulars following, his statutes, and his judgments, and commandments, which he had charged them to observe. (See vi. 1.)

Ver. 2. And know you this day.] Consider seriously what I have said to you, till you be sensible of it, (viii. 5. ix. 6.)

For I speak not with your children, which have not known, and which have not seen.] The words I speak are not in the Hebrew: and they may as well be supplied thus, For not with your children have these things been done, &c. Which agrees well with ver. 7.

The chastisement of the Lord your God.] The plagues he sent upon the Egyptians.

His greatness.] Which appeared by the many great things he did, only upon the stretching out of Moses's rod.

His mighty hand, and stretched-out arm.] These are more words to express the same thing.

Ver. 3. And his miracles, and his acts, which he did in the midst of Egypt.] Or, his miraculous acts, &c. He uses so many words to make them sensible, how much they were obliged to God for their deliverance out of the slavery of Egypt; which nothing could have effected but God's almighty power, declared in various instances. This is the first argument wherewith he excites their love to God (which he pressed in the foregoing chapter, and begins this again with it), that God had loved them so much, as to work many astonishing miracles, rather than let them continue slaves to Pharaoh.

Ver. 4. And what he did unto the army of Egypt, unto their horses, and to their chariots.] Who pursued after the Israelites, and overtook them, (Exod. xiv. 6—8.) Whereby the kindness of God appeared, after he had delivered them, in preserving them from being brought back to their slavery.

How he made the water of the Red Sea to overflow them as they pursued after you.] See Exod. xiv. 23, 24. 27, 28.

And how the Lord hath destroyed them unto this day.] Brought them so low, that they have not recovered their strength, to attempt any thing against you since that time.

Ver. 5. And what he did to you in the wilderness, until ye came unto this place.] Provided for them, protected and preserved them forty years; giving them possession also of the country of Sihon and Og, two kings of the Amorites. These benefits, if they considered, which they could not but see they owed to his love alone, were powerful arguments to move them to love him.

Ver. 6. And what he did to Dathan and Abiram, the sons of Eliab, the son of Reuben.] Numb. xvi. 1, &c. The remembrance and consideration of the terrible vengeance the Lord took upon rebellious people, he uses as another argument to make them obedient. And there was none more remarkable than this upon Dathan and Abiram. He doth not mention Korah; but they would not well forget him, when they thought of his confederates, though he suffered another punishment.

How the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up, and their households and their tents, &c.] See Numb. xvi. 32, 33, &c.

Ver. 7. But your eyes have seen the great acts of the Lord, which he did.] In Egypt, at the Red Sea, and in the wilderness, (ver. 3—5.) Some of which all of them had seen; and there were none of them who had not seen some.

Ver. 8. Therefore shall ye keep all the commandments which I command you this day.] Remembering what had befallen both their enemies and themselves.

That ye may be strong, and go in and possess the land, whither you go to possess it.] In hope that the same God would empower them to subdue the Canaanites, and give them full possession of their country.

Ver. 9. And ye may prolong your days in the land which the Lord sware unto your fathers to give unto them and to their seed.] This may relate both to the present generation, and to their posterity; who, after their fathers had lived long in the land of Canaan, should succeed them, and enjoy it in future ages. (See ver. 21.)

A land that floweth with milk and honey.] This is a common description, in all authors, of a rich and pleasant country. Particularly in Euripides:

Ῥεῖ δὲ γάλακτι πέδον,
Ῥεῖ δ' οἴνῳ, ῥεῖ δὲ μελισσῶν
Νέκταρι———

And the like Bochartus hath observed in Virgil, Horace, and other writers, (Hierozoic. lib. iv. par. i. cap. 12.)

Ver. 10. For the land, whither thou goest to possess it, is not as the land of Egypt, from whence ye came out.] He uses all manner of arguments to persuade them to obedience; from a grateful remembrance of God's former mercies, (ver. 2, 3, &c.) from the terrible punishment of the disobedient, (ver. 6.) from the benefits that would redound to themselves by their obedience, (ver. 9.) and now he represents to them what a noble country he was going to bestow upon them: but of such a condition as would keep them in a constant dependance upon his favour for the blessing of it.

Where thou sowedst thy seed, and wateredst it with thy foot, as a garden of herbs.] This doth not signify that the land of Egypt was not so fruitful as the land of Canaan (for their fertility is not to be compared), but that there they reaped the fruits of their labour with more pains. Diodorus Siculus, indeed, and Herodotus, say, that the Egyptians take the least pains of all other men about their corn, insomuch that it may be affirmed, ἀπονητότατα καρπὸν κομίζονται, they bring in the fruits of the earth without labour, being at no such trouble about ploughing as other men are, &c. (See in his Euterpe, cap. 14.) Yet it must be considered, that as the Nile, which made this fruitfulness, failed them sometimes, and did not overflow all the flat country, so the upper parts of Egypt had not the benefit of it; nor all the lower neither, without great pains in cutting rivers to bring the water to them. Which Pliny calls rigua Nili; for the word rigua properly signifies the little rivers, and διώρυγες cuts, which were made to derive water from the Nile into places at a distance from it, as Salmasius observes, p. 588. in Solinum. Hesychius calls them δοχὰς ὑδάτων, receptacles of water, ditches, or dikes, which we now call canals, as the same author observes, p. 908. And this I find Strabo speaks so plainly in his Geography, (lib. xvii. p. 788.) that his words may serve as a good commentary upon those of Moses: "Nature (saith he) doth much for Egypt by the Nile; but industry and art about that river doth a great deal more. For the higher it flows, the more ground it naturally waters and makes fruitful; Ἀλλὰ ἡ ἐπιμέλεια πολλάκις καὶ τῆς φύσεως ἐξίσχυσεν ἐπιλειπούσης, &c. but industry sometimes hath prevailed when nature hath failed: insomuch, that as great a part of the country hath been watered in the smallest rise of Nile, as in the highest. Which was effected, διὰ τῶν διωρύγων καὶ τῶν παραχωμάτων, by the cuts and banks which were made by art. For before the time of Petronius (he saith) there was the greatest fruitfulness when the Nile rose fourteen cubits; and when it rose only eight there was a famine: but in the time of his government there was as great plenty when it rose only twelve cubits: and no man felt any want when it rose only eight. This was by the care and industry of the people, who were forced also sometimes to carry water from these cuts, as well as from the river, in vessels, to moisten the ground, when the mud which the Nile left was baked into a crust by the great heat of the sun. So that the ground of Egypt might properly be said to be watered by the foot, as we water our gardens when there wants rain." Concerning which expression, see Dr. Hammond upon the Psalms, p. 7. col. 2, of the first edition.

Ver. 11. But the land whither ye go to possess it, is a land of hills and valleys, and drinketh water of the rain of heaven.] Not a low flat country like that of Egypt; but full of hills, which could not be made fruitful but by rain from heaven, which seldom fell in Egypt; but the Israelites might expect in due season, if they were obedient to God. Who, by this means, after they had ploughed their ground, and sowed their corn, made it spring up plentifully without any further labour or care of theirs. Such a country also was more pleasant and healthy than that of Egypt, whose ground next Nile being overflowed more or less every year, by the rising of Nile to the fall of it, (which was from the solstice to the equinox, or, as some say, a hundred days; see Salmasius upon Solinus, p. 427, &c. 436, &c.) they could not walk abroad into their fields; and many times there followed, after the water was gone off, great sicknesses and diseases, by the smell of the silt which it had left behind.

Ver. 12. A land which the Lord thy God careth for.] Takes care that it want not water, by sending showers of rain plentifully from heaven in their proper season.

The eyes of the Lord thy God.] That is, the providence of God; whose majesty dwelt in the sanctuary.

Are always upon it.] To see what is wanting, and to supply it.

From the beginning of the year, even unto the end of the year.] At all seasons, to give them both the first and latter rain, (as he speaks ver. 14.) and such weather as might both produce and kindly ripen the fruits of the earth. This he mentions as an argument to obedience; in which, if they failed, he plainly tells them, the land should not yield her fruit, (ver. 17.) For this country was not so fertile of itself, as by the peculiar blessing of God upon it, whilst they kept his laws.

Ver. 13. And it shall come to pass, if ye will hearken diligently unto my commandments, which I command you this day.] To hearken diligently here signifies, to consider them seriously, and lay them to heart.

To love the Lord your God, and to serve him with all your heart, and all your soul.] He repeats this so often, because it is the great commandment (as our Saviour speaks), and because nothing is more natural than to love our benefactors, God especially (our greatest benefactor, who gave us our being), with all our heart, and with all our soul. (See x. 12.) And being the first and great commandment, it draws along with it obedience to all the rest, and is, in effect, the whole duty of man to God. For constant experience shews us, that whosoever gets the firm hold of this affection, governs a man as he pleaseth.

Ver. 14. That I will give you the rain of your land.] As much as is sufficient for such a hilly country.

In his due season.] At the proper times, which here follow.

The first rain.] Before the sowing of their seed, to prepare the ground; and after it was sown, that it might take root in the earth, and spring up.

And the latter rain.] When the corn was grown up towards earing-time; and after it was eared, to make the ears full and plump. This appears from Amos iv. 7. where he speaks of withholding the rain from them, while there were yet three months to the harvest. Which is meant of this latter rain, whereby their corn was brought forward, when it was but in the blade to earing, and so on to harvest.

That thou mayest gather in thy corn, and thy wine, and thine oil.] Till the corn, and all the fruits of the earth, be brought to maturity.

Ver. 15. And I will send grass in thy fields for thy cattle.] To make them fat; or to give plenty of milk.

That thou mayest eat, and be full.] Eat flesh if they pleased, as well as the fruits of the earth, in great plenty.

Ver. 16. Take heed to yourselves, that your heart be not deceived.] By the specious colours that other nations put upon their idolatry, (as, the antiquity of it, universal consent, &c. there being no part of the world at that time, as Maimonides observes, where all were not accustomed to worship images, &c.) whereby the Israelites were in danger to be seduced into an imitation of their neighbours.

And ye turn aside, and serve other gods, and worship them.] By this it is evident that Moses is still pressing them to care in observing the first and second commandments.

Ver. 17. And then the Lord's wrath be kindled against you.] For their being deceived into idolatry by false reasonings, which persuaded them what they did was lawful, did not excuse them before God; who expected they should have used greater caution, and governed themselves by his plain and express commands.

And he shut up the heavens, that there be no rain.] The contrary to this is called opening his good treasure, Deut. xxviii. 12. signifying that they lived upon the royal bounty of the King of heaven, which their sins would hinder from flowing to them.

That the land yield not her fruit, and lest ye perish quickly from off the good land which the Lord giveth you.] To withhold rain from them was a sore judgment, which quickly brought a famine; which was very grievous to those who used to live so plentifully. And it was frequently attended with various diseases, whereby they were wasted and consumed.

Ver. 18. Therefore shall ye lay up these my words in your heart, and in your soul.] See chap. vi. 6.

And bind them for a sign upon your hand, that they may be as frontlets between your eyes.] Always in sight; as the rule whereby they should order their steps, lest they trod amiss. This is one of the portions of Scripture, (from ver. 13. to the end of ver. 21.) which the Jews write in their tephilim, as they call them, which they use when they say their prayers, which they fancy are thereby made more acceptable unto God. This conceit began, not long before our Saviour's time, in the school of Hillel and Shammai, and took such root in the minds of the most religious, that it hath grown to a great superstition ever since. See upon chap. vi. ver. 8, 9. which is another portion of Scripture, that they wrote in these parchments; though at the first (St. Jerome saith, upon Matt. xxiii. 5.) they wrote only the ten commandments.

Ver. 19. And ye shall teach them your children.] This is repeated very often, (iv. 10. vi. 7.) And out of this place, and v. 1. the Jews have framed this as one of the affirmative precepts, that they ought themselves to learn the law of God, and teach it unto others. And this they do so diligently, that, as soon as their children are capable to understand any thing, they make them carefully read the holy books; and instruct them so, that, before they can be called youths, they are acquainted with the whole law of God. In which, we must confess, they shame a great many Christians, who scarce understand so much of our religion when they are men and women, as the Jews do of theirs when they are mere children.

From the Hebrew word limmalethtem, in this verse, ye shall teach them, the Jews have framed a conceit that their Talmud hath its name; signifying teaching and instruction, as R. Jechiel saith, in his disputation with Nicolaus, p. 9.

Speaking of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, &c.] Taking all occasions to inculcate these precepts upon them, (see chap. vi. 7.) and upon their daughters as well as their sons; though the Jewish doctors commonly fancy there is no command to instruct their daughters in the law. (See Mischna Sota, cap. 3. sect. 3. with Wagenseil's Annotations, and the Gemara there, p. 471. 501.)

Ver. 20. And thou shalt write them upon the door-posts of thy house, and upon thy gates.] See chap. vi. 9. By this means God's word being so rooted in the hearts of the parents (to use the words of Dr. Jackson), as to bring forth this good fruit in their practice, the seed of it might be sown in the tender hearts of their children, and be propagated from one generation to another.

Ver. 21. That your days may be multiplied, and the days of your children, in the land which the Lord sware unto your fathers to give them.] Nothing is wont to move men more than love to themselves, and love to their children, whom they love next to themselves.

As the days of heaven upon the earth.] As long as this world shall last. Which the Psalmist, speaking of David, expresses in this manner, "His seed shall endure for ever, and his throne as the days of heaven," (Psal. lxxxix. 29.) which doth not signify absolutely for ever, but a long time. For thus Baruch says, the Jews in Babylon were commanded to pray for the life of Nebuchadnezzar, and the life of Baltasar his son, ἵνα ὦσιν αἱ ἡμέραι αὐτῶν ὡς αἱ ἡμέραι τοῦ οὐρανοῦ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, that their days might be as the days of heaven upon earth. Which is the very phrase of Moses here in this place, importing a very long life. And such hyperbolical expressions, every one knows, are used by the heathen, particularly by Virgil, (Æneid. 1.)

—— "Convexa polus dum sidera pascet."

Ver. 22. For if ye shall diligently keep all these commandments, &c.] To love the Lord your God. This is still made the condition of all their happiness. (See ver. 13. and x. 20.)

To walk in all his ways.] In observance of his laws, which was the fruit of true love to him.

And to cleave unto him.] So as to serve no other God, but to persevere in the worship of the Lord their God alone. The Jews make this one of the six hundred and thirteen precepts of the law (as they count them) distinct by itself; but they interpret it foolishly; of sticking to the cabala of their wise men, whereby they fancy themselves united unto God.

Ver. 23. Then will the Lord drive out all these nations from before you.] As he had often promised, (vii. 23. Exod. xxiii. 27.)

And ye shall possess nations greater and mightier than yourselves.] See chap. vii. 1.

Ver. 24. Every place wherein the soles of your feet shall tread shall be yours.] That is, every place of the promised land; as it is explained in the next words.

From the wilderness.] viz. Of Sin, which was on the south of Canaan.

And Lebanon.] Which was its bounds on the north.

From the river, the river Euphrates.] Which was the eastern limits; when in the days of Solomon their empire reached hither; according to the promise unto Abraham in Gen. xv. 18.

Even unto the uttermost sea shall your coast be.] Which is called the Mediterranean, or the Midland Sea, which bounded it on the west. See Numb. xxxiv. 6. where it is called the Great Sea; and in that chapter the bounds of their country round about are described.

Ver. 25. There shall no man be able to stand before you.] See vii. 24.

For the Lord your God shall lay the fear of you, and the dread of you, upon all the land that ye shall tread upon, as he said unto you.] For God had promised to terrify the inhabitants of Canaan, and take away their courage, (Exod. xxiii. 27.) And accordingly the spies whom Joshua sent, brought him an account of the great consternation wherein the whole country was, when they were about to enter into it. (Josh. ii. 9. 24.)

Ver. 26. Behold, I set before you this day a blessing and a curse.] That is, he proposed them to their choice.

Ver. 27. A blessing, if you obey the commandments of the Lord your God, which I command you this day.] Which he more largely explains, xxviii. 2—4, &c.

Ver. 28. And a curse, if ye will not obey the commandments of the Lord your God.] Which is also more particularly laid before them, xxviii. 15—17, &c. The whole historical part of the Old Testament witnesses the truth of this, that God blessed or cursed them, according as they observed or broke his laws. And if the people of Israel had diligently marked, and considered, and laid to heart, that their happiness or misery were always corresponding to their good and bad behaviour towards God, it would have confirmed their belief of their law, as much as if they had seen all the miracles done before their forefathers, and supplied the want or the rarity of them in after-ages; nay, this would have done more than all the miracles did, which were forgotten in a short time; whereas their own daily experience of the happy fruits of obedience, and the mischief of disobedience, would have sealed these truths unto their conscience.

But turn aside out of the way which I command you this day, to go after other gods which ye have not known.] It was not every sin that turned God's favour from them; but their idolatry and apostacy from him: against which he principally warns them, throughout all these chapters, iv. 3, 4. 15, 16. 23. v. 32. vi. 4. 14. vii. 4, 5. 25. viii. 19. ix. 12. x. 20.

Ver. 29. And it shall come to pass, when the Lord thy God hath brought thee into the land, whither thou goest to possess it, that thou shalt put the blessing upon Mount Gerizim, and the curse upon Mount Ebal.] To quicken them unto a strict care in their obedience, blessings and cursings were to be pronounced with great solemnity at their first entrance into the land of Canaan; as is more fully ordered xxvii. 11, 12, &c. and performed by Joshua, (viii. 33—35.) And Moses seems to enjoin them the like solemnity, every seventh year, xxxi. 10—13.

Ver. 30. Are they not on the other side Jordan.] With respect to the place where Moses now was, the mountains he mentions were on the other side of Jordan, in the land of Canaan. In which they had no sooner got footing, but Joshua took care to execute this command; that their hearts might be possessed with a sense upon what terms they were to enjoy it. And he describes the places so particularly, that they might be sure to know them.

By the way where the sun goeth down.] On that side which inclined to the west.

In the land of the Canaanites.] The people particularly so called, who were one of the seven nations; some of which lived here in the east, and others near the Midland Sea. As I have observed upon Gen. xv. 21.

Which dwell in the champaigne over against Gilgal.] Some think these mountains were at such a considerable distance from Gilgal, that they cannot be said to be over against Gilgal; because this phrase signifies them not to be far off one from the other. And therefore they translate these words, looking towards Gilgal. But it is not said, that the mountains were over against Gilgal, but the dwelling of the Canaanites (in whose country these mountains were) was over against it.

Beside the plain of Moreh?] Of which mention is made Gen. xii. 6. where the Canaanites are also mentioned as in that land, when Abraham came into it. Which suggests to us, that these blessings were pronounced in that very place where Abraham anciently dwelt, and where he worshipped God, who there appeared to him.

Ver. 31. For ye shall pass over Jordan, to go in to possess the land which the Lord your God giveth you, and ye shall possess it, and dwell therein.] He would have them be as careful in this matter, as it was certain that they should shortly go over Jordan, to take possession of the country which God was about to bestow on them; which he assures them they should get possession of, and settle themselves therein.

Ver. 32. And ye shall observe to do all the statutes and judgments which I set before you this day.] But then do not forget what I have so often said to you, which he thought he could not inculcate enough. (See iv. 40. v. 32. vi. 1. vii. 11. viii. 1, &c.)

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 1. THESE are the statutes and judgments which ye shall observe to do, in the land which the Lord God of thy fathers giveth thee to possess, &c.] Now, I suppose, he begins a new exhortation, which he made to them at some small distance from the former. And he enters upon it with the same words, which he used before, vi. 1. ix. 1. which could not be too often repeated, considering the great proneness of the people to neglect their duty.

Ver. 2. He shall utterly destroy all the places wherein the nations which ye shall possess served their gods.] So that no opinion should be left of their being sacred places by any relic or memorial of the old idolatry remaining there. It was not sufficient that the gods which the seven nations worshipped were abolished, but the very places also where they were worshipped were to be made common, and employed to other uses.

Upon the mountains, and upon the hills, and under every green tree.] These were the places where the ancient heathen chose to worship their gods, imagining their sacrifices were more acceptable upon mountains than in valleys. Lucian himself gives this reason for it, because men were then nearer to the gods, and so more easily obtained audience: Ὅτι τῶν εὐχολέων ἀγχόθεν ἑπαΐουσι οἱ θεοί. And Tacitus saith the same in the last of his Annals. Demons also were wont to haunt woods and shady places, and there appear to men: and were thought also to be the presidents of mountains; others of woods and forests. And accordingly the heathen erected altars to them in these and such-like places, particularly under great oaks, which were held sacred places, where their gods were thought to have a peculiar power. By this law therefore God intended to root out this superstition; and commanded his tabernacle to be built low and humble. And though afterward the temple was set upon a hill, there was only one, and no more: and therefore it could not be thought to be out of any opinion that a hill was more sacred than another place.

And under every green tree.] Nothing can illustrate these words more, than what Pliny saith, in the twelfth book of his Natural History, concerning trees; which thus begins, Hæc fuere numinum templa, &c. "These were the temples of the gods; and even now the simple people, after the ancient rites, dedicate to God such trees as excel the rest. Nor do we more adore the images glittering with gold and ivory, quàm lucos, et in iis silentia ipsa, than we do the groves, and the solemn silence therein." And then he reckons what trees were peculiarly sacred to Jupiter, Apollo, Minerva, &c. concluding that several of their gods, such as the Sylvani, Fauni, and some of their nymphs, had their names from woods. This was a thing so notorious, that in their most sacred solemnities, they were wont to present the gods whom they worshipped with a crown or garland made of boughs and leaves of such trees in which they were thought to delight; as to Jupiter, a crown of oak; to Apollo, of laurel; to Minerva, of olive; to Venus, of myrtle; to Bacchus, of ivy; to Rhea, Pan, Neptune, and Vulcan, of pine, &c. (See Ezek. Spanhemius upon Callimachus's hymn to Diana, ver. 200.)

Ver. 3. And ye shall overthrow their altars, and break their pillars, and burn their groves with fire; and you shall hew down the graven images of their gods.] See vii. 5. and Lev. xxvi. 1. He mentions all these so particularly, because this is the very foundation and hinge of the law (as Maimonides speaks), that all opinion of the sanctity of such things should be blotted out of men's hearts, and the memory of them extinguished, More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 29. where he reckons abundance of things of this kind, which were among the old idolaters called Zabii.

And destroy the names of them out of that place.] From this, and such-like places, the Jews have framed this affirmative precept, that the gentile idolatry is by all means to be destroyed. For these nations having forfeited their land by their abominable wickedness, and God having bestowed it upon the Israelites, (whom he took for his peculiar people, and among whom he dwelt, and therefore calls this his land, see vii. 6.) he, as the King of the country, might enjoin what orders he pleased to have observed. And it was of the highest concernment, that there should not be the least footstep of the old idolatry left in the country; but that he who was the Lord of it, and the Lord of heaven and earth, should be alone acknowledged and worshipped. And there was a greater reason for this than at first sight may be imagined: for, as the host of heaven was worshipped, as the glorious bodies wherein their gods inhabited (which was the reason of the best of the heathen for this worship), so their demons were supposed to dwell in the images and pillars which for that end were erected to them; the sovereign celestial gods being worshipped in the sun, moon, and stars, wherein they were thought to dwell, and these petty deities, the demons, were worshipped in images and columns, which were made for them, and for no other deities, as our Mr. Mede observes, par. i. p. 778.

Ver. 4. Ye shall not do so unto the Lord your God.] That is, not serve him upon the mountains, nor in groves, nor under green trees. Which appears to be the sense, both from the foregoing words, (ver. 2, 3.) and from the following opposition in the next verse. And it is very probable, that, during their continuance in the wilderness, none sacrificed in high places, but offered all at the door of the tabernacle, which was not far from them. When they came into Canaan, and were many of them at a distance from the tabernacle, they did sacrifice in high places; and we do not find them reproved for it while they worshipped the Lord alone, and had priests who officiated there, and in other places, according to the precepts of the law: but when the temple was built, and the ark of God's presence no longer removed from place to place, the prophets required them not to sacrifice any longer in high places, nor any where else, but only at the temple. And they blamed even good kings for not taking away the high places, though no sacrifices were offered upon them to any strange god, but to the true God alone. Which connivance proved in time a great mischief; for here they first began to worship strange gods, the Israelites being very prone to choose mountains, and such shady places (as the rest of the world did), wherein to set up their images, (2 Kings xvii. 10, 11. Ezek. xx. 28. Hosea iv. 13.)

Ver. 5. But unto the place which the Lord your God shall choose out of all your tribes.] Unto one certain place which God intended to set apart; unto which all the tribes should resort, as the only place where they might sacrifice. By which means the notion of the unity of God was preserved, and his worship kept pure and sincere, as long as they kept to this one place, where the priests of God constantly attended, to see his service rightly performed.

To put his name there.] By the name of God is meant God himself (as to call upon his name, is to call upon him), and therefore the sense is, where he would make his dwelling-place, by settling the ark, and the cloud of glory there, which was the token of his presence. This place at first seems to have been Mispeh, and afterward Shiloh. And when that was destroyed, the ark removed to several places (Kirjath-jearim, Mizpeh, Gilgal, Nob, Gibeon, the house of Obed-Edom), till at last it settled at Jerusalem. Where, when the temple was built, God saith to Solomon, "I have chosen this place to myself, for a house of sacrifice," (2 Chron. vii. 12.) Which is the plain sense of these words, choose a place to put his name there.

Even unto his habitation shall ye seek, and thither thou shalt come.] This explains what he means by the place where he would put his name, viz. the place where his sanctuary was settled, which was his habitation; where he placed his majesty (as Onkelos paraphrases), that all might repair thither, to seek his grace and favour.

Ver. 6. And thither ye shall bring your burnt-offerings, and your sacrifices.] By sacrifices, as distinct from burnt-offerings, must be meant their sin-offerings and peace-offerings. And the latter of these were sometimes for mercies received, and sometimes free-will-offerings, or vows, as we read in Lev. vii. 12. 16. Which, if they had been bound, as oft as there was occasion, to bring to one certain place (Jerusalem suppose), though they were at never so great distance from it, it would have been an intolerable expense to devout people. And therefore the Jews think the meaning is, that they were bound to these sacrifices, either for offences committed, or for mercies received, &c. at the next feast at the farthest; and not to defer them beyond that time. (See Dr. Lightfoot in his Temple Service, p. 99, 100. of the first edition.)

And your tithes.] Not those which were to be paid to the Levites, or by them to the priests, but another tithe which was to be set aside, after that to the Levites was paid, and employed as is directed, xiv. 22, 23, &c. (See here below, ver. 17.)

And heave-offerings of your hand.] The first-fruits, as the LXX. and Vulgar Latin rightly translate it, viz. of corn, and wine, and oil, and other fruits of the earth. Which are called the heave-offerings of their hands, because they brought them in their own hand; and having heaved them up to the Lord, they gave them to the priests. (See Numb. xviii. 11, 12. and Deut. xviii. 4. xxvi. 4. 10.)

And your vows, and your free-will-offerings.] Which were comprehended before under the name of sacrifices, but here more particularly expressed, to signify, that though they might choose whether they would offer them or not, or whether they would vow them, yet they could not choose the place where they should be offered (if they vowed, or were disposed to it), but must be determined by this law.

And the firstlings of your herds, and of your flocks.] This shews, that the heave-offerings of their hand comprehend only the first-fruits of the earth; besides which, these firstlings also belonged to the priests, (Numb. xviii. 15—17.)

Ver. 7. And there ye shall eat.] Their part of the things beforementioned; the people being wont, in ancient time, before the law of Moses, to feast upon part of the sacrifices of peace-offerings; as appears from Exod. xviii. 12. xxxiv. 13, 14.

Before the Lord your God.] Not in the tabernacle or temple, where only the priests might eat the most holy things, which were peculiarly theirs, (Numb. xviii. 10.) but in some place very near to the sanctuary: it being the custom of other people (and perhaps before the time of Moses) to feast with their gods in their very temples, or near their altars, according to that of the apostle, 1 Cor. viii. 10. Therefore God entertained his people also at his own house, commanding them here, and in other places, to eat their sacrifices before him at his sanctuary, and no where else; that is, in some place adjacent to the sanctuary. Whereby they declared that they had communion with him, and not with idols, by partaking with him at his table, that is, his altar: for there could be no need of their eating there, but only to signify this, and to secure them in his religion by feasting in his presence, and thereby owning themselves to belong to him. This is repeated very often in this book, (ver. 18. of this chapter, xiv. 23. 26. xv. 20. xvi. 5.) but especially xxvii. 6, 7. where they are required, before the temple was built, to eat their sacrifices near the altar which was erected after they came over Jordan. This being a profession of the true religion, to eat at God's altar, as to eat of things sacrificed to idols was to profess the heathenish religion. So all have understood it, as Elmenhorstius hath shewn from a great heap of authors, in his Annot. ad Minutium Fœlicem, fol. 69.

And ye shall rejoice in all that ye put your hand unto, ye and your households, wherewith the Lord thy God hath blessed thee.] This signifies either that they should rejoice at these feasts in the goodness of God, who had blessed the labour of their hands (of which the tithe they brought thither was a fruit), or that, doing thus, God would bless all their future labours, and make them and their families prosper, and take comfort in all their enjoyments.

Ver. 8. Ye shall not do after all the things that we do here this day.] This doth not signify, as if there was no civil government, or that the courts of justice did not sit and execute judgment between man and man, but relates to the place of offering sacrifice, (as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 15. n. 4.) which, in their wandering condition, they did not so strictly observe as God expected when they came to be settled. Our learned Dr. Spencer thinks it relates also to other old customs, which were rather childish than profane; and therefore tolerated by God for the present. To which he thinks those words of St. Paul have respect, Acts xiii. 18. Many things also perhaps they omitted, which they could not, or did not, observe in the wilderness; as their new moons, and other solemn days; with several rites of purification and cleansing prescribed by the law of Moses.

Every man whatsoever is right in his own eyes.] This doth not import that there was no good order kept among them, or that they were left at liberty to sacrifice where they pleased; but that, in such an uncertain state, when they were removing from place to place, many took the liberty in such matters to do as they thought good.

Ver. 9. For ye are not yet come to the rest.] This explains what goes before, and gives the reason why God connived at some irregularities, because they were not fixed to a place, but uncertain when they should have a sign to pack up their goods, and be gone to another station.

To the inheritance which the Lord your God giveth you.] Where they were to abide, as long as they observed God's commands.

Ver. 10. And when ye go over Jordan, and dwell in the land which the Lord your God giveth you to inherit.] When their condition was altered for the better, God expected that they should be so too.

And when he giveth you rest from all your enemies round about, so that ye dwell in safety.] This intimates, that the fear they were in, while they wandered in the wilderness, of the incursions of their enemies, might make them sometimes offer sacrifice where they ought not, and commit other disorders.

Ver. 11. Then there shall be a place which the Lord thy God shall choose, to cause his name to dwell there.] God was not pleased (as Maimonides observes) to declare any where in the law where this place should be; but, though he often determines them to one place, (ver. 26. xiv. 23. xvi. 6.) yet he leaves the place undetermined. Which he imagines might be for these three reasons: first, lest the gentiles should get possession of it, and make war upon that account; thinking that this place was the end of the law (as he speaks). And, secondly, lest they, in whose hands it was, should do all they could to destroy it. And, thirdly (which is the truest reason), lest every tribe should desire to have it in their lot, and strife should arise among them about it. (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 45.)

Thither shall ye bring all that I command you, your burnt-offerings, your sacrifices, &c.] All that he mentioned before, ver. 6. This may seem a heavy imposition, that they might not offer them in any place, and at any time: but Maimonides makes this wise reflection upon it; "That God intended to teach them, not to have so high an opinion of sacrifices, as of prayers and deprecations, and such-like parts of Divine worship (viz. acknowledging his goodness, praising him, and giving him thanks), which are the things God mainly intends, and may be offered every where. Whereas sacrifices are not of that account with him; which made him limit them to one place where he should appoint them to be offered; and not suffer any but one certain family to discharge this office. These and such-like things were to diminish the value of sacrifices: for which reason the prophets often reprehend men for their too great diligence and zeal in bringing sacrifices, of which God had no need, and did not principally intend as the worship he delighted in: for which he cites 1 Sam. xv. 22. Isa. i. 11. Jerem. vii. 22. Sacrifices being appointed, and one place for them, not for any good in themselves, but only that all idolatry might be abolished, and the belief of the unity of God preserved," (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 32.)

All your choice vows.] In the Hebrew the words are, as our margin notes, the choice of your vows. So their peace-offerings, which were vows, were called; because they were to be selected out of those creatures which were perfect, and without the least defect. Whereas those creatures which had something superfluous, or lacking in any part, might be accepted for a free-will-offering, which a man was not bound to make, but brought it merely out of good-will. So we read expressly in Levit. xxii. 23.

Ver. 12. And ye shall rejoice before the Lord your God, ye and your sons, and your daughters, and your men-servants, and your maid-servants.] The whole family was to feast with God, and one with another; whereby brotherly love and friendship were increased and strengthened, by their meeting and eating together at one place. And nothing is more joyful, than to see brethren dwell together in unity. (See ver. 7.)

And the Levite that is within your gates, forasmuch as he hath no part nor inheritance with you.] See x. 9. This whole tribe (as Maimonides well notes) being devoted to the Divine service, and the study of the law, neither minded ploughing nor sowing, but were wholly consecrated unto God. And, therefore, we find them very commonly reckoned among the strangers, the fatherless, and the widows, because they had no certain possessions; which made it the more reasonable they should constantly be entertained at these feasts, which were kept at God's house, (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 31.)

Ver. 13. Take heed to thyself, that thou offer not thy burnt-offerings.] Under burnt-offerings are comprehended all the other offerings beforementioned; for these were the chief, and the most usual; and if they might not be offered but at a certain place, much less might any other, as every body might understand, without repeating them all again.

In every place that thou seest.] To be beautiful, lovely, and inviting, by its situation, and shady trees, and fountains, &c. Such as are mentioned ver. 2. Which the gentiles chose, perhaps, wherein to sacrifice, because they were more delightful or solemn than other. Whence Ezekiel, vi. 3. mentions rivers and valleys (together with mountains) where there were fine pastures, and springs of water; which were so pleasant and refreshing in those countries, that they fancied the gods delighted in them. So St. Jerome notes upon Jer. vii. that this gentile error, omnes provincias occupavit, &c. spread itself in all parts of the world, That they should offer their sacrifices at the heads of fountains and delightful groves.

Ver. 14. But in the place which the Lord shall choose in one of thy tribes, there shalt thou offer thy burnt-offerings.]

This he had said before, ver. 5, 6. 11. but repeats it again, because of the great importance of it, to prevent all strange worship. Elijah, indeed, offered upon Mount Carmel, after the temple was built, but it was by a prophetical inspiration; and if any one at that time had asked him if they might take that liberty, he would have answered, By no means; but he that offers out of Jerusalem shall be cut off; (Levit. xvii. 4.) as for what I do now, it is an extraordinary case, to convince the lying prophets of Baal, &c. Thus Maimonides in Seder Zeraim.

And there thou shalt do all that I command thee.] Bring their tithes and first-fruits beforementioned, ver. 6. and eat and rejoice before the Lord, (ver. 7.)

Ver. 15. Notwithstanding, thou mayest kill and eat flesh.] For common food.

In all the gates.] In any city, town, or house. While they were in the wilderness, indeed, they might not kill their beasts, but only at the door of the tabernacle; and, consequently, they ate nothing but peace-offerings, which had been first presented unto God, and part of them burnt at his altar, (Levit. xvii. 3, 4, &c.) But when they went into Canaan, they were freely indulged to kill their beasts in any place, without bringing any part of them to the altar.

Whatsoever thy soul lusteth after.] Of all sorts of creatures, not prohibited in the eleventh of Leviticus.

According to the blessings of the Lord thy God, which he hath given thee.] Suitable to every man's estate and condition.

The unclean and the clean may eat thereof.] They who were under any legal uncleanness might not eat of the sacrifices; but of common food, at their ordinary tables, they might, as well as others.

As of the roe-buck, and as of the hart.] He instances in these, because there was great plenty of them in that country, as Ælian observes in the end of his fifth book; where he saith they were ἐν μεγίστοις ὄρεσι, in the highest mountains of Amanus, Libanus, and Carmel. These creatures might not be sacrificed to God: but they might eat of others which were used in sacrifice (sheep, goats, oxen), as freely as of these which were not.

Ver. 16. Only ye shall not eat the blood.] But of the blood of those creatures they might no more eat, than of those that were sacrificed at the altar. But, as there it was to be sprinkled upon the altar, and then poured out at the foot of it, so here it was to be poured on the earth.

Ye shall pour it upon the earth as water.] So that it might sink into the ground and disappear, as water doth when it is poured on the earth. Which is so strictly enjoined, though it was not the blood of an oblation, to prevent those superstitions which were exercised by the old idolaters about the blood of their sacrifices, in which they thought their demons delighted, and by eating of which they hoped to have communion with them, as Maimonides observes, in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 46.

Ver. 17. Thou mayest not eat within thy gates.] In their own private habitations.

The tithe of thy corn, or of thy wine, or of thy oil.] This cannot be meant of the tithe paid to the Levites, which the people might not eat any where, being appropriated to the Levites alone: he speaking therefore of a tithe which the people might eat, though not at home, yet in the place where the sanctuary was, it must be meant of that which the Hebrews call the second tithe, which was set out after that to the Levites was paid. Concerning which he speaks, xiv. 22, 23, &c.

Or the firstlings of the herds, or of thy flock.] These were entirely the priests' portion by an express law, (Numb. xviii. 15. 17, 18.) and therefore could not lawfully be eaten by the people, either at home, or at the sanctuary. Which makes it necessary to understand this of some other firstlings; and it is not improbable that it is meant of the females which open the womb: for the males only were the Lord's (as appears from Exodus xiii. and other places), who gave them to his priests; but he would have the first-born females also to be in some sort sacred, by requiring them to be eaten at his sanctuary, where his priests had their share of them. For I see no ground to think, that as there was a secondary tithe, so there was a secondary firstling set apart by every man to this use.

Nor any of thy vows which thou vowest, &c.] All such things were also wholly the Lord's, (Levit. xxvii. 28.) and given by him to his priests, (Numb. xviii. 14.) But that is only to be understood of what was vowed to God absolutely, without mentioning any particular use to which it was designed. Besides which, they might vow what they pleased to be spent in solemn feasts with the Levites, the widows, the fatherless, and other poor people; and of such Moses here speaks.

Or heave-offerings of thine hand.] These were first-fruits of corn, wine, and oil, as I said upon ver. 6. which were also the priests' portion, (Numb. xviii. 12.) Therefore this can be meant of no other first-fruits but such as men freely offered, without any obligation to it, to be spent in this fashion; for he was speaking before of such kind of things; unless we will understand this of the first-fruits of young trees, which might not be eaten in three years after they were planted, but in the fourth year were "to be holy, to praise the Lord withal," (Lev. xix. 24.) which, as Josephus saith, were spent in these sacred feasts. (See there.)

Ver. 18. But thou must eat them before the Lord thy God, in the place which the Lord thy God shall choose, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter, &c.] See before, ver. 11, 12.

Ver. 19. Take heed to thyself, that thou forsake not the Levite as long as thou livest upon the earth.] He gives this caution, lest covetousness should make them defraud the Levites of their tithes, and not let them have convenient habitations, or profaneness make them not invite them to the sacred feasts before spoken of. This is repeated xiv. 27. And in this the Jews were so careful, that when there was such increase of the Levites that their cities could not contain them, they assigned them more than were given them at first: for Joshua gave them only forty-eight; but before the captivity of Babylon they had twenty more added to them, as appears from 1 Chron. vi. 65, 66, &c. where, after the mention of the old number, there is an account given of twenty more added to them out of several tribes: for though they could not enlarge the bounds prescribed to their cities, yet, as the number of Levites increased, they might give them new cities. And so they did, that they might not be straitened in their dwellings among them.

Ver. 20. When the Lord thy God shall enlarge thy border.] That is, when he had brought them out of this wilderness, where they were encamped round about the tabernacle, into a spacious country, where they might live far distant from it.

As the Lord hath promised thee.] Which he promised to enlarge even as far as Euphrates, if they were obedient to him, (Gen. xv. 18.)

And thou shalt say, I will eat flesh.] Have a desire to eat it.

Because thy soul longeth to eat flesh.] There were several sorts of flesh that were lawful to be eaten, which they could not have in the wilderness, and therefore might be supposed to desire them very much when they came into Canaan, which abounded with them. And besides, they would have more plenty of such cattle as they now had, which might incline them to keep greater tables.

Thou mayest eat flesh whatsoever thy soul lusteth after.] This was said before, ver. 15. and now repeated with all the rest that belongs to this matter, to let them see God did not intend to abridge them too much of their liberty: for though they might not eat the tithe of their corn, wine, and oil, (and the rest mentioned ver. 17.) at their own home, because they were holy things, and therefore to be eaten in one certain place where God's sanctuary was; yet all sorts of flesh, used at their private tables, he now gives them leave to kill any where, without bringing it to the tabernacle, and offering the blood at the altar, as they were tied to do while they were in the wilderness, (Lev. xvii. 3, 4, &c.) For then the tabernacle was very near to every one of them; but when their border was enlarged, it must needs be at so great a distance from some of them, that it would have been too heavy a burden to oblige them to kill every thing they ate at the tabernacle, and therefore he dispenses with it.

Ver. 21. If the place, &c.] The particle chi may better be translated here because; which makes these words a reason of the allowance given in the foregoing verse, Because the place which the Lord thy God hath chosen to put his name there, is too far from thee, thou mayest kill, &c.

Of thy herd, and of thy flock.] Such creatures as are now allowed for sacrifice, oxen, sheep, lambs, and goats.

Which the Lord hath given thee.] For food as well as other uses.

As I have commanded thee.] Given thee leave to eat at home, without carrying them to the tabernacle: so it follows, And thou shalt eat in thy gates whatsoever thy soul lusteth after; i. e. all manner of things, of which there was great variety, not prohibited by this law.

Ver. 22. Even as the roe-buck and the hart is eaten, so mayest thou eat them.] Which were creatures not allowed to be offered to God in sacrifice, (see ver. 15.) and therefore they might less doubt to eat of them, than of such as were peculiarly appointed for that use. From which they might possibly have thought, that out of reverence to God they should abstain; but are here satisfied they might as freely eat of them as of the other.

The clean and the unclean shall eat of them alike.] Whereas, while they were in the wilderness, only such as were clean might eat flesh, because it was sanctified by being killed at the altar; now all are indulged the same liberty, whether "they were removed from holy things (as the Jerusalem Targum expresses it), or were pure to use them, both might eat flesh alike."

Ver. 23. Only be sure that thou eat not the blood.] Take great care, as the word signifies in the Hebrew (which is, be strong), use thy utmost diligence to prevent this.

For the blood is the life, and thou mayest not eat the life with the flesh.] See what I have noted upon Gen. ix. 4. Levit. xvii. 11. 14.

Ver. 24. Thou shalt not eat it, thou shalt pour it out upon the earth as water.] Since they could not pour it out at the altar, where nobody could meddle with it, they were to pour it out on the earth, that it might sink into it. Or, as the law required in Leviticus, (xvii. 13.) cover it with dust, that the cattle might not lick it up: or, the meaning may be, pour it as a common thing (which water is), without any religious rite used about it.

Ver. 25. Thou shalt not eat of it.] This is repeated here so often, as it is also in Levit. xvii. to shew the weightiness of this command.

That it may go well with thee, and with thy children after thee, when thou shalt do that which is right in the sight of the Lord.] When they neither followed the idolatrous customs which the gentiles used about the blood, nor profanely meddled with that which was peculiar to God, when it was offered at the altar: which was the great reason why they were prohibited to eat blood.

Ver. 26. Only thy holy things which thou hast, and thy vows, thou shalt take, and go into the place which the Lord shall choose.] Only he would have them not to forget that the things mentioned ver. 17. they were not to eat at home, but at the house of God, though it was never so far distant from them.

Ver. 27. And thou shalt offer thy burnt-offerings, the flesh, and the blood, upon the altar of the Lord thy God.] No sacrifices were to be offered any where but at the sanctuary, as he had said before, ver. 6. and now reminds them of it, that they might observe it, and do accordingly.

And the blood of thy sacrifices shall be poured out upon the altar of the Lord thy God.] All their peace-offerings, as well as others, were to be there offered, and their blood poured on the altar as a holy thing; whereas the blood of those creatures they killed at home was poured out, as a common thing, like water.

And thou shalt eat the flesh.] After God and his priests had their parts.

Ver. 28. Observe and hear all these words which I command thee, that it may go well with thee, and with thy children after thee for ever.] This was the great commandment, To serve God alone: and the observance of it was the great condition upon which all their happiness depended; which makes him again press their care in this matter.

When thou doest that which is good and right in the sight of the Lord thy God.] Please God by a strict obedience to this precept.

Ver. 29. And when the Lord thy God shall cut off the nations from before thee, whither thou goest to possess them, &c.] See ix. 1.

Ver. 30. Take heed to thyself that thou be not snared by following them, after that they be destroyed from before thee.] It is plain from hence, that in this chapter, as well as in the foregoing, he is still endeavouring to secure them from the idolatrous customs of the country which they went to possess; which is the ground of the following prohibition, about which he could not say too much, they being so prone to idolatry, and the danger they incurred thereby so exceeding great. There are some of the Jews who think, that by following them is meant following their fashions in their clothes, and in their ornaments (as it is explained in the book Siphri), which might entice them to imitate their religious rites, which it appears by the next words are principally intended.

After that they be destroyed from before thee.] It was the most unaccountable folly to worship the gods of those nations, whom they saw expelled their country for their idolatries.

And that thou inquire not after their gods.] They were not so much as to ask what gods they worshipped.

Saying, How did these nations serve their gods?] Nor endeavour to know the manner of their worship. Which was very different, as Maimonides observes, according as their gods differed one from another; for that sort of worship which was acceptable to one god, might not be given to another. As they uncovered themselves (if we may believe him) before Baal-Peor, and threw a stone to Mercury. See his tract concerning the Worship of the Planets, cap. 3. sect. 2, &c. and Dionys. Vossius's annotations there; where he resolves, that, if they uncovered themselves to Mercury, or threw a stone to Baal-Peor, it was not idolatry, because not their proper worship: which is a foolish opinion; for they were not to use any of their religious rites, no more than to offer sacrifice, burn incense, or bow down to any of their idols, which he acknowledges was idolatry. In short, if they gave the idol the worship proper to him, or that worship which was proper to the true God, he acknowledges they were guilty.

Even so will I do likewise.] Though men only resolve to do it, yet they were guilty of committing this sin. The Jews, indeed, make no great account of sins committed in the heart, yet in this case they are very strict, having framed this maxim, as R. Levi Barzelonita observes, Præcept. ccxxvi. which their rabbins industriously inculcate into their scholars, that "the blessed God imputes no thought of any transgression to an Israelite, as if it were the fact itself, except only the thought of idolatry, which is imputed to a man, as if he had committed idolatry." Now it was a reasonable presumption, that he who inquired how the people of Canaan worshipped their gods, intended at least to worship the God of Israel, as they did those idols: and this gave too much cause to suspect, that he had an inclination to worship their idols instead of God: for otherwise he would have rested content with that way of worshipping God which the law had prescribed. Whereupon the Jews have determined (as our Mr. Thorndike hath observed), that there are four ceremonies, which, whosoever performs to any thing but to God alone, must be understood to worship it for God; which are sacrificing, burning incense, pouring out drink-offerings, and adoration. But others there are, by doing which men cannot be concluded to worship any thing but God, till they do it in that way and fashion as is done by those who profess to worship it for God. (See his Principles of Christian Truth, chap. 26.)

Ver. 31. Thou shalt not do so unto the Lord thy God.] See ver. 4. of which the reason is here given.

For every abomination to the Lord which he hateth, have they done unto their gods.] For instance: "The Zabii (saith Maimonides), I find in their books, offered to their great god, the sun, seven bats, and seven mice, and seven other creeping things: which alone may suffice to demonstrate how vile and abominable their worship was, and what reason there was so severely to prohibit their idolatry, and every thing pertaining to it." (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 29.)

For even their sons and daughters they have burnt in the fire to their gods.] This is the great instance of their abominable wickedness. Of which, see Levit. xviii. 21. xx. 2. This was notoriously practised by the Carthaginians, who, it is certain, derived it from the Phœnicians, the ancient inhabitants of this country. Plato mentions it in Protagora, where he saith, "The Athenian laws did not permit them to sacrifice men; but among the Carthaginians it was a holy rite; so that some of them permitted their sons to be offered to Saturn:" which wicked custom at last overspread all nations, even the Greeks themselves, as Joh. Gensius hath demonstrated, lib. de Victimis Humanis, par. i. cap. 11. and par. ii. cap. 6.

Ver. 32. Whatsoever thing I command you, observe to do it.] Keep close to the precepts I have given you about my worship, ver. 28. and see iv. 2.

Thou shalt not add thereto, nor diminish from it.] They were not to add any other rites of worship of their own devising, or from the idolatrous customs of those countries, nor omit any of those which God had commanded them to use: for if they had used any of the gentile ceremonies, whereby they honoured their gods, it would easily have introduced the worship of the gods themselves, and, if they had omitted any of the rites which God had ordained, some other would have easily stepped into their room which were used by idolaters.

Maimonides, from these words, labours to prove the eternity of the law of Moses. But it is very strange, that so great a man should be so blind as not to see what some of his brethren could discern, that God did not bind up himself neither to change nor alter these laws, though he did not permit the Israelites to do it. So the author of Sepher Ikkarim wisely glosses upon these words: (lib. iii. cap. 14.) "The Scripture prohibits us to add unto, or detract from, these precepts, according to our will and pleasure; but what hinders the blessed God either to add or detract, when his blessed wisdom shall think fit? Which he illustrates in the foregoing chapter, by this example among others; A physician prescribes a diet to his patient, for such a time as he judges convenient, which he doth not declare to the sick man. Now when the time comes that the physician hath obtained his end, he changes the diet, and permits his patient what he formerly forbade, and prohibits that which he formerly permitted. Which exactly agrees to what our blessed Saviour had done."

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1. If there arise among you.] In future times.

A prophet.] One that pretends to have a message from God delivered to him in a vision, or by the word of the Lord: for there was a constant succession of prophets (to whom God revealed his mind several ways) among the Jews, to preserve them in the true worship of God, and instruct them in their law, and admonish them on some occasions of things to come; which was the more necessary, because there were such kind of persons among the gentiles.

Or a dreamer of dreams.] Who pretended God had appeared to him in a dream, (as he did unto Jacob, Gen. xxviii. 11.) and revealed his mind to him. Such there were in Jeremiah's time, (Jer. xxix. 8.)

And give thee a sign.] Foretell something.

Or a wonder.] By what follows one would think this belongs to the foregoing words, which are to be understood as if he had said, If he foretell some wonderful thing, which shall shortly come to pass. Or, it may be interpreted, shall work a miracle; unto which the heathen did not so much pretend, as they did to predictions, which were common among them.

Ver. 2. And the sign or the wonder come to pass whereof he spake unto thee.] The event confirms the prediction; so that he seem a true prophet.

Saying, Let us go after other gods which thou hast not known, and let us serve them.] And, consequently, he persuade you to worship other gods, which he pretends is demonstrated to be lawful, by the fulfilling of his sign and wonder.

Ver. 3. Thou shalt not hearken unto the words of that prophet, or dreamer of dreams.] Notwithstanding, look upon him as a liar, and not as a true prophet: for God cannot contradict himself, nor do any thing to persuade men to forsake him, and give his worship to another. This shews that he still pursues his intention (in this chapter, as well as all the foregoing), to establish them in the belief and worship of one God, according to the first commandment, from which nothing was more likely to seduce them, than false prophets, who were the great instruments of establishing the foulest idolatry in Israel, as appears from 1 Kings xviii. 19. where we read of no less than four hundred prophets of Baal, and four hundred and fifty prophets of the groves, that is, of other false gods, particularly Astarte, as Mr. Selden conjectures, in his Syntagma ii. de Diis Syris, cap. 2. And there could not be a greater demonstration that a man was a false prophet, than if he endeavoured to draw them to the worship of other gods, or if he pretended to speak in the name of any other god, (Deut. xviii. 20.) or if he commanded them to offer such sacrifices as God abhorred. Thus Aristander (as David Chytræus notes) discovered himself to be a false prophet, though he foretold the destruction of Babylon; for he required human sacrifices to be offered: as Tiresias also predicted victory to the Thebans, provided Creon's daughter was offered up in sacrifice; and Chalcas at the time of the siege of Troy, but together therewith commanded the sacrifice of Iphigenia. These, and such-like things, plainly discovered they were not inspired by God, who is the lover of mankind, and cannot delight in their blood.

For the Lord your God proveth you, to know whether you love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul.] That there might be an open and public discovery made, whether they sincerely loved God or not, or were steadfast in their religion. So Maimonides in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 24. "God would make known to the nations of the world the measure of your faith, in the truth of his law, and of the approbation wherewith you apprehend it," &c. For it had been a great weakness to suffer even a miracle to shake their faith, after it had been confirmed by so many miracles.

Ver. 4. Ye shall walk after the Lord your God.] Follow the will of God (as Maimonides interprets it), declared by himself, (More Nevochim, par. i. cap. 38.) Which is a plainer and more genuine interpretation than that of the Gemara of Sota, cap. 1. sect. 52. where R. Chama expounds it of imitating God, in clothing the naked, visiting the sick, burying the dead, &c. for "beneficence is the beginning and the end of the Divine law." Which is a pious sense, but not here intended.

And fear him.] Worship him alone, (vi. 2.)

And keep his commandments.] The greatest of which is this, (xi. 13.)

And obey his voice.] Which you heard from Mount Sinai, saying, "Thou shalt have no other gods but me."

And ye shall serve him, and cleave unto him.] Steadfastly adhere unto his service, and not be drawn from it by any persuasion.

Ver. 5. And that prophet, or dreamer of dreams.] These two signify persons who pretended to different sorts of revelations, by visions or by dreams.

Shall be put to death.] This the Jews interpret to signify strangulation, unto which, upon good proof of the fact, he was to be sentenced by the great Sanhedrin: for that was a received maxim among them, that "a lying prophet was to be judged no where but by the council of seventy." (See Selden, lib. iii. de Synedriis, cap. 6. n. 1.)

Because he hath spoken to turn you away from the Lord your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, and redeemed you out of the house of bondage.] Persuaded you to forsake your God and his service, to whom you owe your liberty, and all your possessions in the land of Canaan.

To thrust thee out of the way which the Lord thy God commanded thee to walk in.] These words express how zealous such impostors were in their importunities, and how restless in their endeavours to draw men to idolatry, pressing them so earnestly, as if they would force them to it.

So shalt thou put the evil away from the midst of thee.] i. e. The danger of idolatry; by taking away the life of him that would have seduced others unto it.

Ver. 6. If thy brother, the son of thy mother.] Who lay in the same womb with him.

Or thy son, or thy daughter.] Who were dearer than a brother.

Or the wife of thy bosom.] Who was still dearer, sleeping in the same bed with him, as the Jerusalem Targum expounds it.

Or thy friend, which is as thine own soul.] Whom thou lovest as thou dost thy life. He puts a friend in the chief place, (as the son of Sirach also doth, Eccles. xxxiii. 19.) which their wives, by the ill choice they made of them, had not always in their affection.

Here is no mention of father or mother, because a child, as the Hebrews fancy, was to have more reverence for them, than to accuse them of any crime whatsoever. As if a greater regard was to be had to them than to God himself. The true reason is, because there was no need to name them; for, if their piety to God was to overcome their love to all those relations beforementioned, it could not be supposed that respect to parents was to come into competition with it.

Entice thee secretly.] In the foregoing verses he speaks of an open seducer, and here of a secret one; there of one that came with authority, and here of one of the ordinary people.

Saying, Let us go and serve other gods.] The Jews think this is meant of one who invited others to idolatry, but did not press them with reasons, as in the former case. Which is not likely; for all men pretend some reason or other for such a great alteration as that to a new religion.

Which thou hast not known, thou nor thy fathers.] This aggravates the crime; to entice them to forsake God, who was known to have done such wonders for their fathers, and was so good to them, and go to serve gods with whom they had no acquaintance.

Ver. 7. Namely, of the gods of the people which are round about you, nigh unto thee, or far off from thee.] Wheresoever they were (for several nations had several gods), whether in the neighbouring countries, or in remote parts; it made no difference at all, if they were strange gods.

From one end of the earth, even unto the other end of the earth.] The enticer might possibly suggest the universality of the worship to which he invited him, as an argument to embrace it.

Ver. 8. Thou shalt not consent unto him.] As many words as there are in this verse, the Jews think there are so many precepts. The first of which is this, not to be led by affection and kindness to yield unto his motion. So they interpret these words, thou shalt not love him.

Nor hearken unto him.] I do not see how this differs from the former; but they interpret it, that they ought to hate him, as well as his motion. So Maimonides, in his book of the Worship of the Planets, (cap. 5. sect. 6, 7.)

Neither shall thine eye pity him.] This they fancy signifies, that, if he were in danger of death, they should not help him, but let him perish.

Neither shalt thou spare.] When he was brought before the judge, they were not to intercede for him, nor say any thing in his favour, nor assist him to defend himself.

Neither shalt thou conceal him.] Dissemble any thing that might make against him. And, no doubt, God intended by all these words to signify, that he ought to be looked upon as his greatest enemy; upon whom therefore they were to have no mercy, but to prosecute him unto death, as guilty of the highest treason against the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 9. But thou shalt surely kill him.] Not privately, as he enticed others, but by a legal process against him in a court of judgment. And that not the highest, but in the court of twenty-three, who might proceed against him, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 6. The only difficulty was, how to prove him guilty who enticed another secretly (as the text saith), and not before witnesses. To which the Jews answer, That he who was enticed was to dispose some persons as secretly near to the place of their next meeting, who might hear all he said, and testify it in court.

Thy hand shall be first upon him to put him to death.] He was to be stoned to death, and the accuser was to throw the first stone at him, together with the witnesses, (xvii. 7.) For it would have weakened the credit of his accusation if he had not been the foremost in the execution. (See xvii. 7.)

And afterward the hand of all the people.] Who were to assist in the execution of this sentence.

The first words of this verse, which we translate, Thou shalt surely kill him, the Vulgar Latin translates, Thou shalt forthwith kill him. And so the Jews understand the Hebrew phrase, Killing thou shalt kill him; i. e. immediately have him before the court of judgment. As the LXX. understood it, ἀναγγέλλων ἀναγγελεῖς περὶ αὐτοῦ, informing thou shalt inform against him, that is, without delay. And accordingly the Jews add, that, after he was condemned, he was immediately also put to death. Whereas in other crimes the execution was respited, after the sentence was pronounced, for a day and a night, that the man might have time to clear his innocence, if he were able, by any new proofs. Such severity was but needful among a people prone to idolatry, and encompassed on all sides with idolatrous nations.

Ver. 10. And thou shalt stone him with stones, that he die.] But if, upon admonition, he desisted from his enticement, and repented of what he had said to his neighbour, and resolved himself not to worship other gods, he was not bound to inform against him.

Because he hath sought to thrust thee away from the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, &c.] See ver. 5. The very attempt of this was criminal, though he did not prevail in his seducement.

Ver. 11. And all Israel shall hear and fear, and shall do no more any such wickedness as this among you.] The end of this severity was to preserve the body of the people from the contagion of idolatry. Nothing being more apt to deter men from crimes than such exemplary punishments of them. So Callimachus, in his hymn to Ceres, (ver. 23.) makes this the design of the punishment she inflicted on Erysichthon, that others might shun the like transgression.

———— ἵνα καί τις ὑπερβασίας ἀλέηται·

Ver. 12. And if thou shalt hear say in one of thy cities, which the Lord thy God hath given thee to dwell in, saying.] If the infection was spread into a city, or a considerable part of it, there was still more danger, and greater severity was to be used, to prevent the whole country about it from being drawn away from their allegiance to the Divine Majesty. And therefore, upon such an information as follows in the next verse (which is here meant by thou shalt hear say), given to the great Sanhedrin, they were to do as is directed ver. 14.

Ver. 13. Certain men, the children of Belial.] So the most profligate wretches are called in Scripture, (Judg. xix. 22. 1 Sam. i. 16. x. 27. xxv. 17. 25.) signifying lawless persons, who had no regard either to God or men.

Are gone out from among you.] Left the worship of God at the tabernacle: for it doth not signify their forsaking the city (in which they continued to seduce men from their religion), but forsaking their communion in Divine service. By which many have well observed that place in St. John may be interpreted, 1 John ii. 19.

And have withdrawn the inhabitants of their city.] The Hebrew word which we here translate withdraw, is twice before (ver. 5. 10.) translated thrust away; signifying only earnest endeavours to seduce men from their religion. But here it seems to signify also the effect of those endeavours, whereby they had prevailed with men to forsake the God of Israel, or to worship other gods with him.

Saying, Let us go and serve other gods, which ye have not known.] Strange gods, as they are often called in Scripture, which the nations round about them worshipped, (ver. 7.) but were always abhorred by true Israelites.

Ver. 14. Then shalt thou inquire, and make search, and ask diligently.] The great Sanhedrin, who only could take cognizance of this crime, were, upon this information, to send some, on whose fidelity they could rely, to examine the truth of the report which was spread abroad, concerning the defection of a city to the worship of other gods. Who were to use their utmost care and diligence in this inquisition, and, by all possible means, endeavour to find whether or not the information was true. For it was a matter of great concernment, that neither the innocent should suffer, nor apostates go unpunished. But the punishment being so dreadful, there was the greater exactness used to be certain of the crime; and there were likewise a great many temperaments (as Mr. Selden calls them) found by the Jewish lawyers (partly from the nicest interpretation of every syllable in these two verses, and partly from the pretended tradition of their elders), whereby they mitigated the sharpness of this law. For they would not proceed upon it to destroy a city, though they found them idolaters, unless the seducers were two, or more; and those also men, not women; because the law here speaks in the plural number, of certain men, children of Belial. As if their forsaking God was not a crime, whether they were persuaded to it or not by others. They say, also, it was not to be a mere town, or village, but a city; because the words here are in one of thy cities, in which there were more than a hundred houses: if there were fewer, it was no city in their account, and so escaped. They who seduced a city also were to be of the same city; because it is said here, These men of Belial are gone out from among you. All which are mere quirks, which have no solid reason in them. They are all mentioned together in the title Sanhedrin, set forth by J. Coch. cap. 11. sect. 4. and by Maimonides more largely, in his Avoda Zara, and our Selden, lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 5. n. 2.

But there are other temperaments of this law, which have better foundation in reason. As, first, that a city was not to be destroyed, unless the major part of the inhabitants were fallen off to serve other gods. And, secondly, that the law speaks only of lesser cities, not of those which were so large that the greatest part of a tribe lived in it; for God would not have a whole tribe cut off by the senate. Thirdly, they might not destroy any of the six cities of refuge, because they were none of theirs, but God's: and the words of the law are, "In one of thy cities, which the Lord hath given thee to dwell in;" whereas these were given for a further purpose. And, fourthly, some add, not a frontier town; because it is said, in the midst of thee (so the words are in the Hebrew, which we translate among you), to which they subjoin a better reason, because the whole country might have been exposed to be overrun with the gentiles. And, lastly, they except Jerusalem from this law, because it was God's seat; and (as Maimonides will have it) it was not distributed to any particular tribe. Which, how it is to be understood, see Selden in the place abovenamed, sect. 3, 4. where he touches upon all these. But, if Jerusalem was to be excepted from the judgment of men, God took care to have this sentence executed upon it by his own judgment; for he sent Nebuchadnezzar against it, whose soldiers burnt with fire both the house of the Lord, and the house of the king, and all the houses of Jerusalem, (Jer. lii. 13.)

And, behold, if it be truth, and the thing be certain, that such an abomination is wrought among you.] If the inquisitors found, upon due examinations, that there was a plain and evident proof of their guilt, they were to make their report to the great Sanhedrin; who, being satisfied that either the whole city, or the greater part of them, were fallen to idolatry, sent to them two men of extraordinary wisdom (who were candidates for the senatorial dignity) to admonish them, and, by arguments and persuasions, to endeavour to reduce them to the worship of the Lord God of Israel. And if they prevailed, they were pardoned, and no further proceedings against them: but if they continued obstinate, then the Sanhedrin commanded the people of Israel to raise an army, and besiege the place, and enter it by force, if they could not otherways. And when the city was taken, several courts were appointed to try and condemn all that were guilty. Thus Maimonides, in the forenamed treatise, reports the method of proceeding, out of their ancient authors. (See Selden, sect. 6.)

Ver. 15. Thou shalt surely smite the inhabitants of that city with the edge of the sword.] The same author there saith, that, in the hearing of their cause, every one who was found guilty of idolatry, after admonition, by two witnesses, was set aside: and if they proved to be the lesser part of the city, they were stoned (according to the law of single apostates), the rest being freed from punishment: but if they were the greater part of it, they were sent to the great Sanhedrin, who adjudged them to be cut off by the sword, together with their wives and children. And thus the whole city was to be punished if there was an universal defection.

Destroying it utterly, and all that is therein, and the cattle thereof, with the edge of the sword.] In the Hebrew the word is, Thou shalt make it a cherem, or an accursed thing. And so the LXX. Ἀναθέματι ἀναθεματεῖτε αὐτήν, where the Vulgar translates it as we do, Thou shalt utterly destroy it; which is consonant to the notion of the Hebrew word. (See Selden, lib. i. de Synedr. cap. 7. p. 131.) So that if any righteous man had any thing therein at that time, it was to be destroyed, as the very words are in the title Sanhedrin, cap. 11. sect. 5. But it is to be supposed, that all who feared God would remove their effects, together with themselves, from so wicked a place, before sentence was pronounced against them. On the contrary, they say, the goods of the idolaters, wheresoever they were found, whether within the city or without, were to be burnt.

Ver. 16. And thou shalt gather all the spoil of it into the midst of the street thereof.] Into the market-place, as the Jews interpret it. Or, if it had none, they were to make a spacious place, into which all the spoil and the household-stuff was to be brought, and fire set to it, to consume it, as an anathema, or cursed thing. What temperaments, as they called them, there were to mitigate the severity of this sentence, see Mr. Selden, in the place forenamed, sect. 7.

And shalt burn with fire the city, and all the spoil thereof, every whit, for the Lord thy God.] For the vindication of God's honour, and preserving men in their allegiance to him. R. Simeon, in the title Sanhedrin, interprets it in this manner, sect. 6. "Thus saith the Lord, If you do justice upon a city full of idolatry, I will account it, as if you had offered a whole burnt-offering unto me."

And it shall be a heap for ever; it shall not be built again.] The Hebrew doctors do not entirely agree in the interpretation of these words. For some of them say (in that place of the Sanhedrin now named), that they were not so much as to make a garden or orchard in that place. Others of them say, though it might not be restored into the form of a city, yet they might employ the ground in plantations of trees. But there are those who interpret the words so rigidly, that they think it was not lawful to erect any building there, not so much as a dove-house, but it was to lie waste. (See Selden, sect. 8.) If any man did attempt to build such a city, he was to be beaten, as the same great man observes, lib. i. de Synedriis, cap. 13. p. 558.

Ver. 17. And there shall cleave nothing of the cursed thing to thine hand.] They were not to take the smallest part of the spoil to their own use. "For as long as the wicked are in the world (say the Jews in the forenamed title Sanhedrin), the fierce anger of God will remain in the world; but when they are removed, the wrath of God also will cease." Now the wickedness of purloining any thing that was a cherem, as the Hebrews call it, or an accursed thing, appears in the story of Achan, who brought all Israel into danger by it, as we read in the seventh of Joshua. And Saul is an eminent example of it also, for he lost his kingdom for this sin, (1 Sam. xv. 3. 9. 19. 26, &c.)

That the Lord may turn from the fierceness of his anger.] This explains, in part, what he means in the former verse, when he bids them burn the city and the spoil, for the Lord their God, i. e. to pacify the Divine Majesty, who was highly incensed by such a wickedness. The punishment of which was, indeed, very terrible, but very necessary; because the crime was of so high a nature, that it struck at the very foundation of their religion and government.

And shew thee mercy, and have compassion upon thee.] God promises to deal the better with them, for executing this judgment upon such dangerous offenders.

And multiply thee, as he hath sworn unto thy fathers.] They were not to fear any want of people, by cutting off such a multitude; for God promises to increase them by this loss.

Ver. 18. When thou shalt hearken to the voice of the Lord thy God, to keep all his commandments which I command thee this day, &c.] It was not sufficient that they kept themselves from idolatry, unless they also executed his vengeance upon idolaters: for the inflicting the punishment beforenamed was as right in his eyes, as the observance of any other of his precepts.

CHAP. XIV.

Ver. 1. YE are the children of the Lord your God.] So the Lord had owned them to be, when he sent Moses unto Pharaoh, to command him to dismiss Israel; telling him he was his son, even his first-born, (Exod. iv. 22, 23.) This was a good reason, therefore, why they should own no other God but him; and, consequently, follow none of the customs of idolatrous people, but be wholly governed by his laws.

Ye shall not cut yourselves.] This might seem to forbid the making any incisions in their body, as the heathen did (at least in future times), who marked themselves thereby to belong to such and such gods (for the Israelites had received the mark of God in their flesh by circumcision, which obliged them to receive no other), if the following words did not plainly determine this to their cutting themselves for the dead; which hath been sufficiently explained in Levit. xix. 28. Yet it is fit to note, that the Jerusalem Targum expounds this of incisions here and there for idolatry. And it may be further observed, that the heathen were wont to cut themselves in pangs of devotion, (as appears by the priests of Baal, 1 Kings xviii. 28.) as well as when they were full of sorrow and grief for the dead, (Jer. xvi. 6.) and in all public calamities, (Jer. xli. 5. xlvii. 5.) All which arose from an opinion they had, that the more they afflicted themselves, the less they should be afflicted by God.

Nor make any baldness between your eyes for the dead.] Some of the heathen, saith Theodoret (Quæst. 13. upon this book), cut off all their hair, and offered it to the dead; others shaved their beards; and others their eye-brows and eye-lids, or (which some think is the meaning of between their eyes) the hair in the forepart of their head, or near their temples, as R. Solomon interprets it. Which seems to be the meaning of the Jerusalem Targum, which translates it, Ye shall not make any baldness in the house of your countenance. And whether it were done with a razor, or they used any art, by plasters or ointments, to make the hair fall off, it was the same crime, as Maimonides saith, that is, a piece of idolatry. For this was practised, not merely to make themselves look ruefully, but there was some respect to their gods in it, which is the reason it is here prohibited. Certain it is, that in aftertimes the gentiles pulled off their hair, or cut it off, and laid it upon the face or the breast of the dead, or in their sepulchres, to pacify the infernal gods. We find instances of it in Homer. And likewise they made incisions in their flesh, and spilt their blood at funerals, with the same intention, to appease the gods below, and make them kind to the dead. (See our learned Dr. Spencer, lib. ii. cap. 12. sect. 2, 3.)

All which shews that Moses still pursues the argument, which he begins at the sixth chapter, and hath continued ever since, to press upon them the strict observance of the first commandment. Insomuch, that he would not have them use any of the rites which were used at their funerals by those that worshipped other gods.

Ver. 2. For thou art a holy people unto the Lord thy God; and the Lord hath chosen thee to be a peculiar people unto himself, above all the nations that are on the earth.] The very same words, in a manner, we had before, vii. 6. as a reason why they should destroy the images of the heathen, &c. Which shews he is still speaking of the idolatrous customs which they should eschew, because they were separated to God as a peculiar people by laws different from all other nations. The author of Sepher Cosri speaks not amiss, That the people of Israel were called God's Segullah, because they were elected by him to enjoy special privileges above other people; and brought by him for that end out of the land of Egypt in a wonderful manner, and then had his glory dwelling among them. From whence it is, that he doth not say in the preface to the ten commandments, I am the Lord of heaven and earth, or, thy Creator, and therefore thou shalt have no other gods but me; but I am the Lord thy God that brought thee out of the land of Egypt, &c. to shew that this law was given peculiarly to them; and that they were tied to it, by virtue of their deliverance out of Egypt, and God's placing his glory among them. Whereas, if they had been bound to it by virtue of their creation, it would have belonged to other nations as well as to them. (Par. i. sect. 27.)

Ver. 3. Thou shalt not eat any abominable thing.] All the meats forbidden by God to be eaten are called abominable, not merely because his prohibition made them so, but because the gentile superstition had consecrated most of them to their gods. (See upon Levit. xi. 2.) However, after this law was given, the Jews were to look upon them as abominable; by which means they were kept from having such free conversation, as otherwise they would have had, with their idolatrous neighbours. So that this law also was intended to preserve them in the true religion.

Ver. 4. These are the beasts which ye shall eat.] The original of the difference of meats, see in the learned J. Wagenseil, in his Tela Ignea, p. 553, &c. where he shews it was not to continue for ever. And it is a rational account of this, which I just now gave, that hereby they were preserved from common conversation with other nations, and consequently from their idolatries. But it is a mere fancy, and indeed a proud imagination, which some of the Jews have (particularly the author of Schebet Judah), that as men are more excellent than beasts, because they have better food, so Jews are more excellent than all other men, because they do not feed upon all sorts of animals, but only of some certain kinds; and that after much preparation, by rejecting the blood and the fat, &c. whereby they fancy the flesh is so much altered, that it is not so much flesh as some other food.

The ox, the sheep, and the goat.] These were the only beasts that were offered in sacrifice to God; and therefore are the first that are mentioned as clean for their use.

Ver. 5. The hart and the roe-buck.] These, and the rest that follow in this verse, though they might not be offered in sacrifice, were allowed to be eaten; and seem to be mentioned as the principal food in the land of Canaan, (xii. 15. 22.)

And the fallow-deer.] It is not very material what the word jachmur signifies, because we are not now concerned in this law about difference of meats; therefore we may follow our translation, as well as any other: and the famous Bochartus hath made it probable, that it signifies either a kind of deer, or of goat, (par. i. Hierozoic. lib. iii. cap. 22.)

And the wild goat.] So the Hebrew word akko signifies (which is no where else to be found), the same author proves in the same book, cap. 19.

And the pygarg.] This is also a kind of doe or goat, (as he shews, cap. 22.) which the Hebrews call dison. We find mention of pygargus in Juvenal's eleventh satire; where the old scholiast gives this account of it: that it is a kind of deer, "quæ retriores partes albas habet," whose hinder parts are white. From whence it had its name among the Greeks, who call the buttocks Πύγη.

And the wild ox.] So we translate the Hebrew word theo, or tho. But herein Bochartus dissents; because there were no such creatures in Judea, (as he observes there, cap. 26.) which are bred in colder countries. And therefore he reckons this also among his deer or goats, (cap. 28.)

And the chamois.] The Hebrew word zemer he also thinks signifies, as the former, a kind of goat or hart; of which there was great variety in those countries. And this he thinks of all other was maximè ἁλτικὸν, remarkable for jumping; which is the signification of the word zemara in the Arabic language. (See cap. 21.)

Ver. 6. And every beast that parteth the hoof, and cleaveth the cleft into two claws, and cheweth the cud, that shall ye eat.] He forbears to reckon up any more particulars, and only sets down the general marks whereby they might be known; which he had delivered in Lev. xi. 3. (See there.)

Ver. 7. Nevertheless, these shall ye not eat of those that chew the cud, or of them that divide the cloven hoof, &c.] These exceptions from the general rule have been explained, Lev. xi. 4—6.

Ver. 8. And the swine, because it divideth the hoof, yet cheweth not the cud, it is unclean to you.] See upon Lev. xi. 7.

Ye shall not eat of their flesh, nor touch their dead carcass.] See Lev. xi. 8.

Ver. 9. These ye shall eat of all that are in the waters: All that have fins and scales shall ye eat.] See Lev. xi. 9.

Ver. 10. And whatsoever hath not fins and scales, &c.] See Lev. xi. 10—12.

Ver. 11. Of all clean birds ye shall eat.] He doth not name any (as he did of beasts), but by enumerating those of which they might not eat, all the rest were left free to be used for food.

Ver. 12. But these are they of which ye shall not eat: The eagle, the ossifrage, and the osprey.] All these are mentioned just as they are here in Lev. xi. 13.

Ver. 13. And the glede, and the kite, and the vulture, after his kind.] There are only two of these mentioned in Lev. xi. 14. the last of them, hadajah, being there omitted; for it is so near to haajah, which goes before, that the transcriber (as Bochart imagines) might there leave it out. But rather, Moses now adds this sort of bird, which was not so like in nature as in name; otherwise he would not have distinctly forbidden it.

Ver. 14. And every raven after his kind.] The same words with those Lev. xi. 15.

Ver. 15. And the owl, and the night-hawk, and the cuckoo, &c.] All the birds mentioned in this and the three next verses, 16—18. are the very same which are forbidden in Lev. xi. 16—19. And therefore I refer the reader to what I have noted there; only adding, that from hence it appears how false their opinion is, who think the Hebrew word tzippor is a general name only for small birds (such as sparrows); for it is evident from this place, that it is a name for all birds whatsoever, even the greatest, such as are here mentioned.

Ver. 19. And every creeping thing that flieth is unclean to you: they shall not be eaten.] See Lev. xi. 20.

Ver. 20. But all clean fowls ye may eat.] This is not the same precept with that ver. 11. for there he speaks of birds, but here of other winged creatures, which are not birds, but insects, as we call them. And in Lev. xi. he describes the flying creeping things which they might eat; and particularly mentions several sorts of them, (ver. 22.)

Ver. 21. Ye shall not eat of any thing that dieth of it- self.] Unto this discourse about food, it was very proper to add a caution, (which he had given before, Lev. xi. 39, 40.) that, though they might kill and eat any clean creature, yet if it died of itself, it was unlawful to eat it, because the blood was in it.

Some verses ascribed to Phocylides contain this sense so fully, that one would think he had read Moses. (See Jos. Scaliger in Eusebium, p. 88.)

Thou shalt give it unto the stranger that is within thy gates.] The proselytes of the gate (as they called them) who had not embraced their religion, but were not idolaters, and therefore suffered to dwell among them, might eat such meat, having no obligation upon them to observe these laws; for they were not circumcised.

Or thou mayest sell it unto an alien.] To a mere gentile, who might happen then to be in their country. For there were three sorts of people called by the name of strangers, being not of the Jewish nation. First, such as had received circumcision, and consequently embraced the Jewish religion, who were called gere-tzedek strangers, or proselytes of justice. Others were not circumcised, but yet worshipped the God of Israel, who were called strangers of the gate, or gere-tosha, strangers dwelling among them; because they were to abide in their country constantly. But there was a third sort, called nocherim, which we here translate aliens, who were mere gentiles, and not suffered to have a habitation among them; but only to come and go in their traffic with them.

For thou art a holy people unto the Lord thy God.] This reason was given in the beginning of this discourse, (ver. 2.) and so it is in Leviticus, in the conclusion of it. (See xi. 44, 45.)

Thou shalt not seethe a kid in its mother's milk.] Now he plainly returns to caution them against idolatrous customs. For this was practised among the heathens in the end of harvest, when they sprinkled their fields and their gardens with this broth, to make them fruitful. It is mentioned twice before. (See Exod. xxiii. 19. and xxxiv. 26.)

Ver. 22. Thou shalt truly tithe all the increase of thy seed, which the field bringeth forth year by year.] This doth not seem to reach unto herbs, as the pharisees interpreted it; of which see Grotius on Matt. xxiii. 4. But though Casaubon and Drusius, and other great men, are of this opinion, yet the contrary is maintained by persons of no small note; because our Saviour, when he determines this case, saith, "These things ye ought to have done, and not left the other undone."

As for the tithe here mentioned, I have shewn elsewhere, that it was the manner of the eastern princes to receive the tenth of the fruits of their country, for the maintenance of their ministers and officers; as we read 1 Sam. viii. 15. In like manner, God, the great king of all the earth, and the peculiar sovereign of this country, required a tenth of all their increase for the maintenance of his priests and Levites in his service. After which he ordered also a further tithe to be taken out of the nine parts remaining (which was called the second tithe), to be spent in feasts at his tabernacle. And this is, with great reason, thought to be particularly enjoined in these words; for of such tithes he speaks in the next verse. It might seem indeed a little hard, to give another tenth part, after they had paid one already, which they might be tempted not to perform exactly; and therefore he saith, Thou shalt truly, that is, faithfully, without any deceit or fraud, tithe all the increase of thy seed. And when this was done, he required also, once in three years, a third tithe, for the use of the poor, (see ver. 28.) that they might also be entertained at his cost, though not at that time at his house. For it was suitable to his royal greatness, that all his subjects should be feasted by his order at his palace; and that the poorest of them should not be neglected, but some time or other partake of his bounty; as they did at those feasts I mentioned, where their men-servants and maid-servants were to be entertained as well as the Levites, (xii. 12. 18.)

Ver. 23. And thou shalt eat before the Lord thy God, in the place which he shall choose to place his name there.] See xii. 5, 6.

The tithe of thy corn, and of thy wine, and of thine oil.] This cannot be meant of the tithe paid to the Levites; of which the people were not to partake, but only the priests, to whom the Levites were to give a tithe. Therefore it must be understood of the second tithe, separated (after the other was paid) for this holy use. The design of which was, that they might be secured in his religion, by eating and drinking in his presence; and thereby professing that they belonged to him, and were his thankful servants.

The observation of R. Bechai upon these words [thy corn, thy wine, and thine oil] is something curious, but it hath a great deal of truth in it:—If thou pay the tithe, saith he, then it is thy corn; if thou do not, it is my corn, and not thine (in like manner, if they paid the tithe of wine and oil); for it is said in Hosea ii. 9. "Therefore I will return, and take away my corn in the time thereof, and my wine in the season thereof." For they forfeited the whole, who did not pay the tenth, which was the rent God reserved to himself. And the same R. Bechai represents this as a very merciful law: For it is the fashion of the world, saith he, if a man have ground of his own, to let it out to tenants at what rate he pleases, for a half or third part, to be paid to him: but it is not so with the Almighty, whose the earth is, and who raises clouds, and waters it with rain, and sends down drops of dew, and makes fat the fruits of the earth; and yet requires but one part of ten, for his own uses. This made it highly reasonable, that Moses should admonish the Israelites so often diligently to pay their tithe.

And the firstlings of thy herds, and of thy flocks.] See concerning these, xii. 6.

That thou mayest learn to fear the Lord thy God always.] This justifies what I said, that the design of this was to preserve them steadfast in their religion, by having communion with him, in so solemn a manner, every year: for that is meant by fearing the Lord always; continuing in the worship and service of him alone. (See vi. 1.)

Ver. 24. And if the way be too long for thee, so that thou art not able to carry it; or if the place be too far off from thee, which the Lord thy God shall choose, &c.] If they lived at so great a distance from the sanctuary, or the way was so bad, that it would be very troublesome and chargeable to carry those tithes in kind, here they have a liberty granted them to make money of them, and with that to buy provision for the feast at the sanctuary, when they came thither; as it follows in the next verse. All things, likewise, which would not keep so long as till they could go to the house of God, they were to turn into money; but things that were not perishable, they were to carry in kind, if they did not dwell too far off from it.

Ver. 25. Then shalt thou turn it into money.] Adding a fifth part to it, as the law is, Lev. xxvii. 31.

And bind up the money in thine hand, and shalt go unto the place which the Lord thy God shall choose.] Put it into a bag by itself, and not mix it with other money, but keep it bound up till the next feast; and then carry it in their hand, to the place where God's house was settled.

God would not have them excused from going to that place with these things in kind upon every slight reason; and therefore made it something chargeable to exchange them into money, by requiring a fifth part to be added. And besides, the elders made a constitution, That this liberty should be allowed to none, but those who lived above a day's journey from Jerusalem, which at last was the fixed place of God's worship. And, that it might be known certainly what was a day's journey, the places at that distance were fixed from every quarter; viz. Lydda on the west, the river Jordan on the east, Acrabatta on the north, and Elath on the south, as J. Wagenseil hath observed in his confutation of that blasphemous book, called Toldos Jeschu, p. 22.

Ver. 26. And thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for oxen, or for sheep, &c.] Purchase such provision as they most delighted in, of all meats that God's law allowed.

And thou shalt eat there before the Lord thy God.] Make a holy entertainment at the house of God.

And thou shalt rejoice, thou and thine household.] Men-servants and maid-servants, as well as sons and daughters, (xii. 18.) together with the Levites, widows, orphans, and strangers.

Ver. 27. And the Levite that is within thy gates, thou shalt not forsake him.] They were always to be invited to these feasts. (See xii. 19.)

For he hath no part nor inheritance with thee.] They being wholly devoted to the worship of God, and the study of the law, as Maimonides observes, in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 39. (See xii. 19.)

Ver. 28. At the end of three years thou shalt bring forth all the tithe of thine increase.] The opinion of the Hebrew doctors is, That this was not a distinct tithe from that which they call the second tithe, paid every year, but the very same, which every third year was not to be carried to the sanctuary, but to be employed to the comfort of the poor, in their own cities and houses. For thus they explain it: That in the third year after the year of release, and in the sixth year, the tithe that was wont to be carried to the place where the sanctuary was, and there spent in feasts before God, was to be spent upon the poor in every town where they that paid the tithe lived; but every first, second, fourth, and fifth year, from the year of release, it was spent in holy entertainments at the house of God. In the year of release itself (which was every seventh year), no tithes at all were paid of any kind, because all lay common. So that every year the owner of the ground set out a second tithe; but he was not bound to carry it every year to Jerusalem; for in the compass of seven years, four of those years only were appointed for their journey thither, and two they stayed at home. (See Selden, of Tithes, and lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. p. 693.) But this is contradicted by other great men, particularly by Bishop Montagu, who asserts these to be two distinct tithes: see p. 332, &c. especially p. 346. and those that follow. And Josephus seems plainly to be of his mind, p. 349. Old Tobit calls it τρίτην δεκάτην, the third tithe, i. 8.

The tithe of thine increase the same year.] i. e. Of the third year.

And shall lay it up within thy gates.] It was not to be carried to the place where God's house was, but to be spent at home.

Ver. 29. And the Levite, because he hath no part nor inheritance with thee.] See ver. 37.

And the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, which are within thy gates, shall come, and shall eat, and be satisfied.] This tithe was not spent in joy and gladness, as the second tithe was, (ver. 26.) when they went to God's dwelling-place, but merely in the relief and comfort of the poorer sort of people, who otherwise might have been forced to beg, or to serve strangers, and thereby be in danger of being perverted from their religion.

That the Lord thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hand which thou doest.] This tithe, the Jews say, was called the consummation of tithes; because herein the love of their neighbours was most eminently apparent. For it is likely they themselves had no share in this, as they had at the feasts upon the second tithe, but is wholly spent upon the persons here named. Whose hearts could not but be moved to pray to God for his blessing upon them in all their labours, which he here promises to bestow.

CHAP. XV.

Ver. 1. AT the end of every seven years.] It appears, from ver. 9. that this phrase signifies as much as every seventh year.

Thou shalt make a release.] Perfectly free their brethren from all their debts which they owed to their creditors. This year was famous not only for this, but for letting servants go free (as some think, Exod. xxi. 2.) and for letting their ground rest, (Lev. xxv. 34.) and for reading this law publicly to all the people, (Deut. xxxi. 10.)

Ver. 2. And this is the manner of the release.] It is thus to be understood.

Every creditor that lendeth aught unto his neighbour shall release it.] It was an entire acquittance, not of debts contracted by sale of lands or goods, to those who were able to pay, but of money lent to a neighbour or friend, merely to relieve his poverty, not to carry on trade, or to make a purchase. For nothing could have been more absurd, than to have extinguished such debts, whereby the borrower was enriched.

He shall not exact it of his neighbour or his brother.] Here the word brother is added, to explain what is meant by a neighbour; viz. an Israelite, or a proselyte entirely of their religion, who had all the privileges of an Israelite. Some think, that by not exacting money lent to such a man, is meant no more but only forbearing to demand it in this year, because there was no sowing or reaping in it; or if he did, that he should not have power to recover it by law this year, though afterward he might. But the plain meaning seems to be, that he should be perfectly free from his debt, as a servant, after six years, was from his service:

though, if afterward he grew rich, in good conscience he was bound to pay it.

Because it is the Lord's release.] In the Hebrew the words schemitta laihova signify, that this year was a release to the Lord, or for the Lord. In honour, that is, of him, who made this a year of great charity: in obedience to whom they were bound to be very kind to their poor brethren. But the Jews fancy they were not bound to be so kind as to make this release, till the very last day of the year. So that if a man had borrowed money in the beginning of it, he was not acquitted till the year expired.

Ver. 3. Of a foreigner thou mayest exact it again.] Of an alien, as we translate the word nocri, in the foregoing chapter, ver. 21. that is, of one who was neither an Israelite, nor proselyted to their religion, but a mere gentile. The only question is, whether they were not to remit the debts of a proselyte of the gate, who, I think, is no where called their brother in the law; and therefore they were not obliged to discharge them from what they owed.

But that which is thine with thy brother thine hand shall not touch.] This seems to restrain it wholly to those who were Jews, or had all the privileges of Jews.

Ver. 4. Save when there shall be no poor among you.] Whether we follow this translation, or that in the margin of our Bibles, it appears that they were obliged to acquit only their poor brethren; of whom they were not to exact their debts, lest they should be tempted to flee to the gentiles, and forsake their religion: so this was a provision still against idolatry. Or, if we understand it as it is in the margin, to the end that there be no poor among you, the sense is the same; that they were by this charity to keep men from extreme necessity, which might force them to go a begging, or to seek for relief in strange countries.

For the Lord shall greatly bless thee in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance to possess it.] He would not have them think that they might become poor themselves by this means; for he assures them God would prevent that, by sending his extraordinary blessing upon them. Cardinal Cajetan, and some others, understand this verse as if it were all of it a promise, and contained no precept in it; viz. That God would take care they should not be burdened by this law, for he would so bless them, that they should have no poor among them; and then they were not obliged to acquit those of their debts, who were able to pay them.

Ver. 5. Only if thou carefully hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe to do all these commandments which I command thee this day.] Particularly this, of releasing their poor neighbours from their debts; which would entitle them to the blessing he promises again in the next verse.

Ver. 6. For the Lord God blesseth thee, as he promised thee.] God had many ways blessed them already, and he promises to reward their obedience with greater blessings.

And thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow.] Grow so very rich, that other nations should come to borrow of them; but they be beholden to none.

And thou shalt reign over many nations, &c.] I suppose he means no more than Solomon doth, when he saith, the borrower is servant to the lender, (Prov. xxii. 7.) But it may extend to their dominion over many nations, whom they conquered, till they enlarged their bounds as far as Euphrates.

Ver. 7. If there be among you a poor man of one of thy brethren in any of thy gates, in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not harden thy heart, nor shut thy hand from thy poor brother.] As they might be inclined to do, after the passing of this law; thinking with themselves, that what they lent to such a man they should never have again, but must lose it if he were not able to repay it before the year of release. This seems to be the meaning of this verse, which the Jews interpret not of lending, but of giving alms. It is not much material which way we take it: for he that lent to a poor man, was willing to give what he lent, if he could not pay him before the year of release, after which he could not demand it.

Thou shalt not harden thine heart, nor shalt thou shut thine hand from thy poor brother.] Covetousness proceeds from want of pity, tenderness, and compassion towards others in their miseries; unto which nature itself inclines us, especially towards members of the same society. And the Jews had several particular obligations to be tenderhearted, as they were all children of God after a peculiar manner, who had been wonderfully kind and merciful to them, (xiv. 2.)

Ver. 8. But thou shalt open thine hand wide to him.] Bountifully supply him with what he wants.

And shalt surely lend him sufficient for his need, in that which he wanteth.] The Jews understood this, not merely of affording him food sufficient to satisfy his hunger, and clothes to cover his nakedness and keep him warm, but furnishing him with household goods (if he had been forced to sell all he had), that he might live comfortably. Yea, they proceed so far, as to determine, that the neighbourhood should join together, and make a purse for him, to put him in as good a condition as he was before he fell into this want. They determine also the quantity that every man should give; a very liberal person the fifth part of what he had, if need required; a man of moderate bounty, a tenth part. If any man gave less when the case required more, he was accounted a niggard; or, as they phrase it, a man of an evil eye. But, notwithstanding all these precepts, and their interpretations, the Jews so little minded their poor, that their governors were at last forced (as we now, alas! do) to lay a rate upon the rich for the maintenance of the poor, which they enabled their officers to exact. See Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6. and Maimonides de Donis Pauperum, set forth by a very learned friend of mine, Dr. Prideaux, cap. 7. who argues from this place, that if a poor man wanted a wife, they were bound to provide him one, &c.

Ver. 9. Beware that there be not a thought in thy wicked heart, saying, The seventh year, the year of release, is at hand.] If such a thought came into their mind, that they should lose what they lent, because the seventh year approached, they were bound to stifle it immediately, and not suffer it to lodge there.

And thine eye be evil against thy poor brother.] This move thee to be unkind and unmerciful to him. So a man of an evil eye, signifies in Prov. xxiii. 6. one that grudges what another eats at his table.

And thou givest him nought.] Lending was in this case giving; when a man was very poor, and the year of release so near, that he could have no prospect of his being able to repay him.

And he cry unto the Lord against thee.] Make his doleful complaint unto God, finding no relief from men.

And it be sin unto thee.] God charge it upon thee as an offence against his majesty, yea, a great offence. For so the word sin sometimes signifies, (John xv. 24. James iv. 17.)

Ver. 10. Thou shalt surely give him.] Not fail to relieve his wants.

And thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him.] They were not only to relieve him, but to do it cheerfully.

Because that for this thing the Lord thy God shall bless thee in all thy works, and in all that thou puttest thine hand unto.] There is no difference between all their works, and all that they put their hand unto (for all works are performed by the hand), unless one refer to what they did within doors, and the other to their labours in the field.

Ver. 11. For the poor shall never cease out of thy land.] There would always be some or other among them, who stood in need of the forenamed charitable relief, by which they might be preserved from extreme poverty; which God intended to prevent, as is plain from ver. 4. (See Grotius upon St. Matt. xxvi. 11.) The Jerusalem Targum understands this, as if there should have been no poor amongst them, if they had been obedient to God's precepts.

Therefore I command thee, saying, Thou shalt open thine hand wide.] If any one refused to give, or gave less than became him, Maimonides saith, in the forenamed place, the Sanhedrin compelled him to it, and whipped him with the stripes of rebellion or contumacy (i. e. very sorely), till he gave as much as they judged he ought to do.

To thy brother, to thy poor, and thy needy, in thy land.] Here are evidently three different sorts of persons mentioned as objects of their charity, which may be looked upon as directing the excellent order of it. For, first, they were to relieve those that were nearest to them in blood, called here their brethren. Then, secondly, such as were in great misery. And, thirdly, such as were low in the world, and required some help, but not so much as the former sort. Some indeed will not admit such a difference between the words poor and needy, but think the last signifies such whose condition was calamitous; about which I think it is not worth while to dispute. I shall rather observe, that God took exceeding great care that none should come to very great want, by the large provision he made for the poorer sort of people; who had the benefit of the third tithe, mentioned in the foregoing chapter, which was wholly given to them every third year; and of the sabbatical year, when all that grew of itself was common to every body; and of this release of debts in the same year; and of the large quantity of corn, which they were bound to leave every year, in the corners of their fields, with the ears that fell, and the sheaf that was left, &c.

Ver. 12. If thy brother, a Hebrew man, or a Hebrew woman, be sold unto thee.] Whether sold by themselves, or by the court of judgment, for theft. But there was some difference between a man and a woman. (See Exod. xxi. 2, 3, &c.) And the same law, they say, was to be observed about those who were sold by their father, or were born of Hebrew slaves.

And serve thee six years, then in the seventh year thou shalt let him go free.] He doth not speak of the year of release, as if he were then to be set free, though he had served but one year, or perhaps no more than half a year before that time came, but of the seventh year from the time of his sale: for he was to serve six complete years, unless the jubilee happened to intervene, when every one was set free, though he had not served so long; but such servants as were taken in the wars, or were sold by Canaanites, or born of them, might be kept perpetual slaves, unless they were maimed by their masters, with the loss of some member of their body.

Ver. 13. And when thou sendest him out free from thee, thou shalt not let him go away empty.] But bestow something upon him for his more comfortable subsistence when he was a freeman. And this comprehends women as well as men, as appears by the foregoing verse: but then it is to be understood of such as went out free by virtue of this law, after they had served six years, not of such as were redeemed by their friends, or redeemed themselves with their own money, (Lev. xxv. 18.) For such might be supposed not to need their masters' kindness, as they did who had nothing to help them out of their slavery.

Ver. 14. Thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock, and out of thy floor, and out of thy wine-press.] That they might put themselves in a way of living well in the world; which they were not able to do without this assistance, because what they got in their six years' service was wholly for their master, and not for themselves. He doth not prescribe a certain measure to their bounty, but leaves every man to express his affection freely towards God and towards his neighbour. But the Hebrews say, they were bound to give them at least thirty shekels of silver.

Of that wherewith the Lord thy God hath blessed thee, that shalt thou give him.] Considering how God hath enriched thee, even by his service.

Ver. 15. And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in Egypt, and the Lord thy God redeemed thee.] And did not bring them empty out of their slavery, but loaded with silver, and gold, and raiment, (Exod. xii. 35.) By which bounty of God to themselves, they might take the best measure of their duty to their poor brethren when they were dismissed from servitude.

Therefore I command thee this thing to-day.] In remembrance of that great benefit, he enjoined this benevolence to poor slaves.

Ver. 16. And it shall be, if he say, I will not go away from thee.] Refused to enjoy his liberty, when his six years' service was expired.

Because he loveth thee and thine house.] The phrase in Exod. xxi. 5. being, saying, shall say, I love my master, &c. Abarbinel from thence gathers, that it was necessary he should often profess how loath he was to leave his master and his family, and make repeated declarations of his affection to them.

Because he is well with thee.] Lives happily. Out of these words Maimonides infers, that there was to be reciprocal love between the servant and his master; for if the servant loved his master, yet if his master did not love him, his ear was not bored; for he could not take content in his staying with him. But these words suppose his master's kindness to him by his good usage of him.

Ver. 17. Then shalt thou take an awl, and thrust it through his ear unto the door, &c.] But first he was to bring him before the judges, that he might there in open court profess the same that he had done to his master; and thereby make it appear there was no fraud or deceit in the business; and that his master did not keep him against his will, contrary to this law. See Exod. xxi. 6. where all this is explained.

And also unto thy maid-servant thou shalt do likewise.] This relates only to the not sending maid-servants away empty; not to the boring their ears, if they had no mind to be freed; for that was not used, if we may believe the Hebrew doctors, to maid-servants. It was sufficient, if they had a mind to stay with their masters, that they addicted themselves, in solemn words, to their service for ever. But there were many differences between a man-servant and a maid-servant, at least in some cases, (see upon Exod. xxi. 7.) which are explained with great nicety by the Hebrew doctors: with which I need not trouble the reader, because there is no such slavery among us in these days.

Ver. 18. It shall not seem hard unto thee when thou sendest him away free from thee.] It is plain by this that he returns to what he was speaking of, ver. 12, 13, &c. concerning their not letting their servants go away empty when they had their freedom: for this was the chief thing that could seem hard to them.

For he hath been worth a double-hired servant to thee.] Who served at most only for three years, and had wages paid him all the time, (Isaiah xvi. 14.)

In serving thee six years.] Twice as long as a hired servant, and for nothing. So that, considering what wages he gave the other, and how small a price, perhaps, they paid for him, they would find themselves gainers by such slaves, and therefore should not think much to give them a gratuity when they send them away.

And the Lord thy God shall bless thee in all that thou doest.] He encourages them to hope they should be greater gainers otherways by this charity, which would procure God's blessing upon their future labours. This argument he had pressed twice or thrice before in this chapter, ver. 4. 6. 10.

Ver. 19. All the firstling males that come of thy herd, and of thy flock, shalt thou sanctify unto the Lord thy God.] All the first-born males were the Lord's, by a law made at their coming out of Egypt; and he gave them to his priests for their portion, (Exod. xiii. 2. 15. Numb. xviii. 15.)

Thou shalt do no work with the firstling of thy bullock, nor shear the firstling of thy sheep.] Besides the firstling males, which alone were separated to the Lord, there were also firstling females; which, though they were not sanctified to him as the males were, yet were not to be employed by the owners, as the rest of their cattle, but offered as peace-offerings to God. Of which they themselves had a good share, though some part of them was given to the priests.

Ver. 20. Thou shall eat it before the Lord thy God.] It is evident from hence, that he speaks of such female firstlings as I mentioned in the foregoing verse; for of the males they might not eat, but they belonged entirely to the priests.

Year by year.] At their solemn festivals, when they were first to offer them unto God; and then the feasts upon these peace-offerings followed.

In the place which the Lord shall choose, thou and thy household.] With the Levites and strangers, &c. whom they were to invite to these sacred entertainments: for this is but a repetition of the law twice or thrice mentioned before, xii. 6, 7, &c. 17, 18. 26. xiv. 23. and upon this occasion here again inculcated, because it was of exceeding great moment, to preserve them in the worship and service of God alone.

Ver. 21. And if there be any blemish therein, as if it be lame, or blind, or have any ill blemish.] This is another reason why he mentions these feasts again, that he might admonish them what to do with their firstlings, if there were any blemish in them, which made them unfit for sacrifice. These blemishes he had spoken of in Lev. xxii. 21, 22. 24. But here adds the lame to those there named. Which the prophet Malachi also mentions (and so do the heathens), as unacceptable unto God, (Mal. i. 8.)

Thou shalt not sacrifice it to the Lord thy God.] No, not to make such a charitable feast at the sanctuary.

Ver. 22. Thou shalt eat it within thy gates.] It was free for them to eat it at home: though it is very probable God expected they should invite the Levites and the strangers, the fatherless and the widows, to partake of it, (as they did of the third tithe, xiv. 29.) because, if it had been without blemish, it must have been so employed at the sanctuary.

The unclean and the clean person shall eat it alike.] Whereas, if it had been sacrificed at their feasts, only the clean could have eaten of it.

As the roe-buck and the hart.] See xii. 15. 22.

Ver. 23. Only thou shalt not eat the blood thereof; thou shalt pour it upon the ground as water.] He takes all occasions to mention this, because it was designed to preserve them free from idolatry. (See xii. 16. 23, 24.)

CHAP. XVI.

Ver. 1. OBSERVE the month of Abib.] Which God, by a special order, made the beginning of their year. (See Exod. xii. 2. xiii. 4. xxxiv. 18.)

And keep the Passover unto the Lord thy God.] He now begins in this chapter, to admonish them about their great feasts which they were to keep; whereby the whole nation was preserved in the worship of one only God, which Moses still pursues to press upon them.

For in the month of Abib the Lord thy God brought thee forth out of Egypt.] In memory of which the feast of the Passover was ordained.

By night.] For then Pharaoh pressed them to be gone, when he saw his first-born slain in the night, (Exod. xii. 29—31.) and then they immediately prepared themselves for their journey, and borrowed of the Egyptians jewels of gold and silver, (ver. 25.) Insomuch that Moses calls this "a night much to be observed unto the Lord," and "that night of the Lord to be observed by all the children of Israel in their generations," (Exod. xii. 42.) though it was day-light before they began their march, as we read there, ver. 22. So that Moses bid them "remember the day when they came out of Egypt," (Exod. xiii. 3.) which comprehends both that which is properly called day and night.

Ver. 2. Thou shalt therefore sacrifice the passover unto the Lord thy God.] The word passover signifies here not only the lamb (which was properly called pesach, or passover), which was offered the fourteenth day at even, but all the paschal sacrifices which followed after, as appears by the next words [of the flock, and of the herd]. Which sacrifices were appointed for all the seven days of unleavened bread, (Numb. xviii. 17—19, &c.) See Bochartus in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 50. where he shews at large that the word passover is here a general word, comprehending the particulars after-mentioned, (p. 565, 566.) and thus translates these words (which he justifies by many like instances), Thou shalt therefore sacrifice the passover unto the Lord thy God, viz. of the flock and of the herd. Which last words are added exegetically, to explain what that passover was which they were to offer unto the Lord. Such sacrifices as were offered in the solemn passover of Hezekiah, 2 Chron. xxx. 22. and of Josiah, 2 Chron. xxxv. 7—9. where it is apparent, that the king and the princes gave to the people, and to the priests, oxen as well as sheep, lepesachim, for the passover-offerings. And thus it is used in the New Testament, John xviii. 28. where it is said, the Jews would not go into the judgment-hall, lest they should be defiled; but that they might eat the passover, i. e. these passover-offerings, which were holy things, of which none might eat in their defilement.

In the place which the Lord shall choose to place his name there.] At the sanctuary, as hath been often said, xii. 5. 11, &c. where all sacrifices were to be offered.

Ver. 3. Thou shalt eat no leavened bread with it.] That is, with the passover beforementioned. Which is a demonstration that all the sacrifices of the flock, and of the herds, spoken of in the foregoing verse, are comprehended under the name of passover. For with the lamb they could not eat unleavened bread seven days, it being to be eaten presently in the evening when it was offered; after which followed the seven days of unleavened bread, which could not be eaten so long with the passover, unless passover signifies all the seven sacrifices.

Seven days thou shalt eat unleavened bread therewith.] See Exod. xii. 15. xiii. 6, 7.

Even the bread of affliction.] So called, because it was insipid, and also heavy upon the stomach, and not easily digested. Whence it had the name of matzah, because it was lumpish, and could not rise as leavened broad doth.

For thou camest forth out of the land of Egypt in haste.] Wanting time to put any leaven to their dough, (Exod. xii. 34. 39.)

That thou mayest remember the day when thou camest forth out of the land of Egypt all the days of thy life.] That their affliction there, and their speedy deliverance from thence, might never be forgotten. For their eating this bread seven days together every year, one would think, could not but make great impressions on their mind; and the more to imprint the sense of God's mercy there, the master of every family, when he brake this bread at the paschal feast, and gave every one a piece of it, said, This is the bread of affliction which your fathers did eat in the land of Egypt. So Maimonides and others tell us. (See Exod. xii. 17.)

Ver. 4. And there shall no leavened bread be seen with thee in all thy coasts seven days.] See Exod. xii. 18—20. xiii. 3. 7.

Neither shall there any thing of the flesh which thou sacrificest the first day at even, remain all night until the morning.] This is a plain description of the paschal lamb, which was to be eaten in the even wherein it was sacrificed, (Exod. xii. 10.) which he forbears here to call the passover (though that name properly belonged to it), because he had called other sacrifices by that name, (ver. 2.) and would not have them confounded.

Ver. 5. Thou mayest not sacrifice the passover within any of thy gates which the Lord thy God giveth thee.] Not at home, as they did when they first came out of Egypt, and that because it was a sacrifice; which was now required to be offered at the sanctuary, as was said before, (xii. 5. 11.)

Ver. 6. But at the place which the Lord thy God shall choose to place his name in, there thou shalt sacrifice the passover.] From whence Maimonides infers, that even whilst high places were allowed, the passover could not be killed any where but at the sanctuary: if any man did offer it in a private high place, he was beaten, as he saith in his treatise concerning the passover, cap. 1. sect. 3.

At even, at the going down of the sun.] Between the two evenings, concerning which see Exod. xii. 6. After the offering of the evening sacrifice, they began to kill the passover, and continued this sacrifice till sun-set.

At the season that thou camest forth out of Egypt.] Then they were preparing themselves for their journey, and had warning to be ready, and eat the lamb with their staves in their hands, as men going forth to travel, (Exod. xii. 11.) though they did not actually go forth till the next morning.

Ver. 7. And thou shalt roast and eat it in the place which the Lord thy God shall choose.] See Exod. xii. 8, 9.

And thou shalt turn in the morning, and go unto thy tents.] Unto their own habitations, which are called tents, because they had no other dwellings when these words were spoken. The only doubt is, whether he permits them to go home the next morning after the even beforementioned, or the morning after the whole feast of unleavened bread was over. It seems most reasonable to expound it of the former, that if men's occasions called them home, they were not bound to stay any longer at the place where the sanctuary was, but till they had eaten the paschal lamb; after which they might return home if they pleased. So Bochartus, who from hence proves that the most solemn days of the feast of unleavened bread were not observed like a sabbath, because men might travel home upon the first day of unleavened bread, as the whole nation travelled out of Egypt on this day, from Rameses to Succoth: yet pious people, who were able to bear so great a charge, were wont, no doubt, to stay the whole seven days before they returned home; because the first and last days of the feast were great solemnities. So they did in the passover of Hezekiah and Josiah, 2 Chron. xxx. 21. xxxv. 17. And there being special sacrifices to be offered every day during this festival (as was beforesaid), Solomon ben Virgæ observes, that all the country thereabouts brought their oxen and their sheep to be sold at this time to those who came from far; so that the mountains round about Jerusalem were covered with them, and not a bit of grass to be seen. He adds also, that whosoever did not come up to this feast, all his goods were forfeited and converted to sacred uses, (Schebet Judah, p. 378.)

Ver. 8. Six days thou shalt eat unleavened bread, and on the seventh day shall be a solemn assembly unto the Lord thy God.] This is to be understood as if he had said, that after they had eaten unleavened bread six days, they should conclude the solemnity upon the seventh day with a solemn assembly, or, as it is in the Hebrew, with a restraint; but still continue also on this day to eat unleavened bread. For this feast was to last seven days, and in all the foregoing books they are expressly required to eat unleavened bread seven days, (Exod. xii. 15. Levit. xxiii. 6. Numb. xxviii. 17.)

A solemn assembly.] Which the Hebrews call atzereth; of the meaning of which see Lev. xxiii. 36.

Thou shalt do no work therein.] That is, no servile work, as it is explained Numb. xxviii. 25. but they might dress their meat, which the LXX. seems to mean in those words, which they add, πλὴν ὅσα ποιηθήσεται ψυχῇ, save only such things as shall be done to preserve life.

Ver. 9. Seven weeks shalt thou number unto thee.] From the morrow after the sabbath, when they brought the sheaf of the wave-offering, as it is explained in Lev. xxiii. 15. (See there.)

Begin to number the seven weeks from such time as thou beginnest to put the sickle to the corn.] For they began to cut barley at the Passover, as is manifest from hence, that Joshua passed over Jordan to enter into Canaan, in the time of harvest, (Josh. iii. 15.) and this was in the month of Nisan, when they kept the Passover, as appears from Josh. v. 10. which month could not be called Abib, or the month of new fruits, if some corn was not then ripe, viz. barley. This Josephus confirms, lib. iii. Antiq. cap. 10. which must be understood, as Hermannus Conringius observes, (in his treatise de Initio Anni Sabbatici, &c.) of that sort of barley which was sown in autumn (as it is this day in Frisia), which required a stronger soil than that sown in the spring, and produced a much richer crop. See Mr. Mede's works, p. 355. who observes how very different their climate was from ours.

Ver. 10. And thou shalt keep the feast of weeks unto the Lord thy God.] The reason of this name is given in the foregoing verse. And see Exod. xxxiv. 22. It was called also the feast of harvest. (See Exod. xxiii. 16.)

With a tribute of a free-will-offering of thine hand, which thou shalt give unto the Lord thy God, &c.] Besides those offerings which are prescribed, Lev. xxiii. 17, 18. Numb. xxviii. 27, &c. The quantity is not directed, but left to every man's piety. And whatsoever it was he brought, it was wholly given to God, and he that brought it had no share in it; but God gave it to his priests.

According as the Lord thy God hath blessed thee.] Though no quantity was prescribed, yet God expected every man should offer proportionably to his estate; and they who had a religious sense of God's goodness in blessing their labours, no doubt acknowledged it by a liberal tribute.

Ver. 11. And thou shalt rejoice before the Lord thy God, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter, and thy man-servant, and thy maid-servant, and the Levite that is within thy gates, &c.] This feast was made of such offerings as are mentioned, xii. 7. 17—19.

Ver. 12. And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in Egypt.] They are often put in mind of this as an argument to charity, particularly towards their servants. (See xv. 15.)

And thou shalt observe and do these statutes.] There was a particular reason for keeping this feast, because it was in remembrance of God's giving them his law from Mount Sinai; where he speaks with them himself.

Ver. 13. Thou shalt observe the feast of tabernacles seven days, after that thou hast gathered in thy corn and thy wine.] This is the third great feast, at which all their males were bound to appear every year, as we read, Exod. xxiii. 16, 17. xxxiv. 22, 23. Of which he puts them in mind again, Lev. xxiii. 34—36. and here, ver. 16.

Ver. 14. And thou shalt rejoice in thy feast, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter, and thy man-servant, and thy maid-servant, &c.] There was the like law at Athens, where king Cecrops ordained (as Macrobius tells us, lib. i. Saturnal. cap. 10.) the master of every family should, after harvest, make a feast for his servants, and eat together with them, who had taken pains with him in tilling his ground; "delectari enim Deum honore servorum, contemplatu laboris," for God delighted in the honour done to servants, in consideration of their labour. This, it is likely, he learnt from Moses, for he reigned at Athens much about the same time that Israel came out of Egypt; and was the first, as Eusebius saith, who taught the Greeks to call God by the name of Ζεὺς, (lib. x. Præpar. Evangel.) which we may interpret the living God. Though therein he seems to be a little mistaken. For Pausanias saith more than once (both in his Arcadica and his Attica), that Δία ὠνόμασεν ὕπατον πρῶτος, he was the first that called Jupiter by the name of the Most High, or Supreme. And the same we read in St. Cyril against Julian, lib. i. (See Joh. Meursius de Legibus Atheniensium, lib. i. cap. 9.)

Ver. 15. Seven days shalt thou keep a feast unto the Lord thy God in the place which the Lord thy God shall choose.] In order to which, that it might be kept the more solemnly, it is once more enjoined, and all the sacrifices that were to be offered in each of the seven days appointed in Numb. xxix. from ver. 12. to ver. 35. where he orders also the eighth day to be solemnly observed for a special reason. (See there.)

Because the Lord thy God shall bless thee in all thy increase, and in all the works of thy hands.] Thankfulness to God for blessings bestowed was the way to procure more.

Therefore thou shalt surely rejoice.] In God the giver of all good things; whom the whole nation, by the institution of this feast, were incited to bless and praise for the fruits of his bounty to them. And peace-offerings were sacrificed on purpose for this end, (xxvii. 7.) From the repetition of this command, Thou shalt rejoice, the Jews infer, that though all festivals were times of joy, yet the feast of tabernacles was to be celebrated with greater joy than all the rest. And accordingly Maimonides tells us, the whole festival was spent in music, and dancing, and singing, night and day.

Ver. 16. Three times in the year shall all thy males appear before the Lord thy God in the place, &c.] This is so frequently enjoined, (see ver. 13.) because it was of the greatest consequence that they should meet as often as they could conveniently, at one and the same place, to worship the Divine Majesty; whereby the notion of the unity of God was preserved among them.

And they shall not appear before the Lord empty.] This is also frequently repeated, where the feasts themselves are enjoined, (Exod. xviii. 15. xxxiv. 20.) And from these and the following words, That every man should give as he was able, &c. came the pious custom in the beginning of our religion, that the people when they came to the Lord's table, offered bread, and wine, and corn, and oil, and such-like things, for the support of God's ministers, and the relief of the poor, every one according to their ability. Which was done in acknowledgment of God as the author of life, and of all good things; for which they, in this manner, shewed their gratitude to him. And the priests, in the presence of all the people, lifted them up, and gave God thanks, and beseeched him to accept them: and out of these, in many places, they made their agapæ, or feasts of charity, for the poor. Mention is made of these oblations in the Canons ascribed to the apostles, chap. 3, 4. which, though not made by them, yet contain a great many apostolical customs.

Ver. 17. Every man shall give as he is able, according to the blessing of the Lord thy God which he hath given thee.] It was but reasonable, that the more bountiful God had been to them, the more liberally they should offer a grateful acknowledgment to him. For all the forenamed three feasts had relation to the fruits of the earth, which God had blessed them withal, as well as commemorated former great benefits bestowed on their forefathers: the Passover being at the beginning of barley-harvest, Pentecost at the beginning of wheat-harvest, and the feast of tabernacles, when they had gathered in all the fruits of the earth. At which seasons all mankind were ever wont to be full of joy, and to offer sacrifices. So Aristotle tells us, (lib. viii. ad Nicomachum, cap. 2.) Αἱ ἀρχαῖαι θυσίαι καὶ σύνοδοι φαίνονται γίνεσθαι μετὰ τὰς τῶν καρπῶν συγκομιδὰς, The ancient sacrifices and conventions seem to have been after the gathering-in of the fruits of the earth, as a first-fruit, at which time chiefly they rested from their labours. And so Strabo, likewise, (lib. x. Geograph. p. 467.) "It is common, both to Greeks and barbarians, to offer their sacrifices with a festival intermission of their labours, &c. καὶ τοῦθ' ἡ φύσις οὕτως ὑπαγορεύει, and so nature taught them to do," that is, to thank God, with rejoicing and cessation from labours. For which he gives this surprising reason, ἥτε γὰρ ἄνεσις τὸν νοῦν ἀπάγει ἀπὸ τῶν ἀνθρωπινῶν ἀσχολημάτων, τὸν δὲ οὕτως νοῦν τρέπει πρὸς τὸ θεῖον· for remission of labour abstracts the mind from human affairs, and turns it towards God. This certainly was the ancient intention of all such festival times, as the heathen themselves could discern.

Ver. 18. Judges and officers shalt thou make thee.] To see that these, and all other laws, were duly observed. Moses de Cotzi, upon these words, makes this difference between schofetim and schoterim: that the former (viz. judges) were the senators in the several courts, who decided causes; and the other (officers) were no more than ministers attending the court, to keep the people in order, with a staff and a whip, and to execute the decrees and orders of the judges; whom they appointed not only in the court, but in the streets, looking after weights and measures in the market, and correcting offenders. Maimonides also makes them the same with our apparitors, or those who, in the Roman law, are called officiales, as Constantine L'Empereur observes, p. 362. upon Cornelius Bertram (who mistook them for a sort of judges), and in the digests executores: and in the New Testament πράκτορας, exactors, Luke xii. 58. Josephus makes them to have been public criers; and so we find them employed, xx. 8. Josh. i. 11. But then some of them, at least, seem to have been an honourable sort, like our heralds, (Josh. xxiii. 2.) and all of them were men of authority, though but young men (as Maimonides describes them), who had not attained the years and knowledge of the doctors of the law, and therefore unfit to be judges. But the Jews place them next under their wise men, or doctors, and above their scribes and clerks, as Mr. Thorndike observes, in his Review of the Rites of the Church, p. 94. But, that they were certainly only under-officers, and not judges, there is another argument; which is, that Solomon upon this account commends the ants, that they carefully do their business, though they have no schoter set over them, (Prov. vi. 7.) on ῥαβδοῦχος, or ἐργοδιώκτης, to force or affright them into it.

In all thy gates.] That is, in every city, as Mr. Selden observes out of the Jewish writers, lib. vii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 5. sect. 1. where he shews they interpret it, in all the cities of Israel, both within the land and without, where Israel had any jurisdiction. Which is so true, that they had consistories wheresoever they were dispersed, for the determining all differences arising out of the law, though not as to the power of life and death, which was seldom granted them by their sovereigns. Thus we learn from Philo, that there was such a consistory at Alexandria; and the little chronicle, called Seder Olam Zuta, tells us of the like in Babylonia. And after the destruction of the temple, it is manifest, not only by the Jewish writings, but by Epiphanius and others, that there continued a consistory at Tiberias for many ages, &c. (See Mr. Thorndike's Rites of the Church, p. 56, 57. and his Review of it, p. 56.)

But though this be granted, yet these words (in all thy gates) may suggest also the part of the city where they kept their court, which was in the gate: for there, as I observed, Gen. xxxiv. 24. all public business was transacted in the time of Abraham and Jacob, and continued so afterward. Insomuch, that the highest court in Moses's time met at the door of the tabernacle, (Numb. xi. 24.) the gate among the Hebrews being the same with forum, as I observed, among the Romans. As we see by 1 Kings vii. 1. where Elisha foretells at what low rates provision should be sold on the morrow in the gate of Samaria. Where it is evident there was a place so spacious, that Ahab assembled four hundred prophets there before him and king Jehoshaphat, who had, no doubt, both of them numerous attendants, (2 Kings xxii. 10.) And before this time, David, it is said, upon the news of Absalom's death, went up to the chamber over the gate, and wept; which we may well think was the council-chamber, (2 Sam. xviii. 33.) And when Joab advised him to come down, and shew himself publicly, it is said, he rose and sat in the gate, and all the people came before him, (xix. 6.) And therefore in these cities, which were so large, there was some place, I make no question, where there were benches for the judges.

Which the Lord thy God giveth thee throughout thy tribes.] In the cities of every tribe there was to be such a court erected, that people might have justice easily and speedily done them. And the Talmudists unanimously agree that the number of judges was proportionable to the greatness of the city wherein they were placed, and of the causes which they judged. Where there were less than a hundred and twenty families in any town or city, there was seated the lowest court of all, consisting of three judges, which tried only actions of debt, or damages done by man or beast, or defamation, &c. But in cities where there were above a hundred and twenty families, there was placed a higher court, consisting of three-and-twenty judges, who tried capital causes. Josephus, indeed, differs from the Talmudists about the number, for he saith they were but seven. Both of them, it is likely, may say true, with respect to different times and places; for it cannot but be presumed that both he and they understood the state of their country in such public matters. But at the place where God chose to settle his sanctuary, unto which all the country resorted at certain times, there was the supreme court of all, consisting, as the Talmudists say, of seventy persons, besides their president, who judged all manner of causes; and none but they could judge a false prophet, or a city fallen to idolatry. All appeals were made to them; but from them there was none, their sentence being final. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 4.)

Such a court, it is certain, there was in future ages, whose number was according to that of the seventy elders chosen by God himself to assist Moses in the government, and endued with the spirit of judgment to qualify them for that office, (Numb. xi. 25.) In Moses's time they sat at the door of the tabernacle, as I observed before; and afterward at Shiloh, or wheresoever the sanctuary was. Though it may be doubted, whether, after Moses's death, and the death of the elders, there was a court consisting of so many judges. Nay, it is highly probable that this consistory itself was not constantly settled there, according to law, till the time of Jehoshaphat; at least, not the inferior consistories beforementioned, which were to be settled in every city. For if they were, what reason can be given why the judges (Judg. v. 10. x. 4. xii. 14.) and Samuel should ride circuit up and down the country to minister justice according to the law, when the people might have had it every day in their several cities? And for this reason, it is likely, Jehoshaphat himself, desiring to put this law in force, first sent some great men, who went about through all the cities of Judah, (2 Chron. xvii. 8, 9.) and then settled judges according to this law throughout all the fenced cities of Judah, city by city, as well as in Jerusalem, (2 Chron. xix. 5. 8.) See Mr. Thorndike, in his Rites of the Church in a Christian State, chap. 4. p. 226. where he observes that Josephus, in express terms, rendering a reason of the great lewdness, upon which the war against Benjamin followed, attributes it to this, that these courts of judgment were not established according to this law, (lib. v. Antiq. cap. 2.) But though this, I think, be very evident, yet it is scarce credible that David, after he was set upon the throne of God in peace, did not take care to settle these courts, as he did to regulate a great many other things. And, indeed, we find a plain intimation of it in 1 Chron. xxvi. 29. but succeeding kings, it is probable, were negligent in keeping up this constitution, till the time of Jehoshaphat, who exercised his authority to enforce the exact practice of this law.

And they shall judge the people with just judgment.] According to the rules of this law. The judges, saith R. Solomon, were to judge the people; and the officers, to constrain them to do as the judges commanded.

Ver. 19. Thou shalt not wrest judgment.] See Exod. xxiii. 6.

Thou shalt not respect persons.] See Levit. xix. 15. and Deut. i. 17.

Neither take a gift; for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous.] The very same is said, Exod. xxiii. 8.

Ver. 20. That which is altogether just shalt thou follow.] The words in the Hebrew are far more emphatical (as they are in the margin), Justice, justice shalt thou follow. Mind nothing but the justice of the cause, and do it to all persons equally.

That thou mayest live, and inherit the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.] Be happy, and continue long in the land of Canaan: for nothing contributes more to the establishment of a government, than the exact and impartial administration of justice.

Ver. 21. Thou shalt not plant thee a grove of any trees near unto the altar of the Lord thy God, which thou shalt make thee.] It is evident from this, that his great aim is to keep them from idolatry; which he still pursues, as he hath done from the beginning of his exhortation in this book. And their history teaches us, that it was very needful to inculcate this so often; for, notwithstanding all that Moses could say, they fell immediately after Joshua's death into the idolatrous customs of Canaan, and could never be wholly purged from their idolatry till the captivity of Babylon. And these words may be translated, Thou shalt not plant thee a grove, nor make any wood (i. e. a wooden image) near to the altar of the Lord thy God. So the LXX. For the very word we translate grove, sometimes imports the idol in the grove, as well as the grove itself. (See 2 Kings xxiii. 6. and Selden, de Diis Syris, Syntagma ii. cap. 2.) Certain it is, that nothing was more ancient in the east, than altars with groves of trees about them; which made the place very shady and delightful in those hot countries. They are so often joined in Scripture, that it would be tedious to number all the places, (Exod. xxxi. 13. Deut. xii. 3. Judg. vi. 25, &c.) Cadmus is thought by some to have brought this custom into Greece out of the east. And they planted the trees so thick, and they were so large and shady, as to make the place very dark and solemn; whereby a kind of horror was struck into those who went into them. And they became hereby the fitter for the devil to play his pranks there; and for the practice of these obscene and uncouth rites whereby he was worshipped. For the gentile custom had made these places proper to the infernal gods, and anciently consecrated them as sepulchres or temples for their heroes. That the Israelites, therefore, might be preserved from sacrificing to the dead, and from filthy lusts (by both which they afterward polluted themselves), they are forbidden to place a grove near to God's altar, nay, so much as any tree (as the words may be translated); for the heathen thought there was a sacredness in trees themselves, which they dedicated to their gods, and honoured several ways. (See xii. 2, 3.) And therefore the Jews say, they might not plant trees in the court of the temple, or in the mountain of the house (as they call it), for the ornament or beauty of God's house. And they gave this reason for it, because it was an idolatrous rite to plant trees near their altars, that the people might there meet together. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6. p. 186. and Dr. Spencer, lib. ii. cap. 16. sect. 1, 2.) And more lately, Ezekiel Spanhemius (in his most learned observations upon Callimachus), hath shewn that they planted odoriferous trees in some groves, to make them more inviting. Whence the grove dedicated to Pallas is called by that poet τεθυωμένος ἄλσος, though that may signify only a grove consecrated by many sacrifices. And the vulgar groves were planted with pines, fir-trees, cypress, laurel, olives, vines, and other lovely trees, especially oaks, which grew to a great height, in which both altars and temples were erected. See in Hymn, in Dianam. ver. 38. p. 156. and in Palladem, ver. 61. p. 595. and in Cererem, ver. 38, 39. p. 689. where he mentions the black poplar, as a tree of which her grove consisted, under the shade of which the nymphs delighted to dance at noon. And thence these shady places, consecrated to their gods, were called ψυκτῆρες, because of their refreshing coolness, as he observes out of Athenæus, (ad ver. 47. p. 695.) And indeed nothing is plainer in the Holy Scripture, than that these groves related to idolatry; for all pious princes took them away, and bad ones planted them. (1 Kings xviii. 4. 2 Kings xxiii. 14. 2 Chron. xiv. 3. xv. 16.) And they are frequently joined with statues and images, both here, and vii. 5. xii. 3. 1 Kings xiv. 23, &c.

Ver. 22. Neither shalt thou set thee up an image.] The Hebrew word matzebah is commonly translated by the LXX. στήλην, a pillar; and so we translate it in the margin. For as it was unlawful to set up the statue of a man, or any other creature, so it was as contrary to religion to set up a pillar, or an altar, or any such-like structure, for public assemblies to be held about them, though they worshipped there the true God. So Maimonides reports the sense of their doctors; "A statue or pillar signifies any work raised up, that religious assemblies may be made there, though they be for the worship of the Divine Majesty; for this is a practice among idolaters." And so Pausanias confesses (in Achaicis), that in the most ancient times, among all the Grecians, τιμὰς θεῶν ἀντὶ ἀγαλμάτων εἶχον ἀργοὶ λίθοι, rude stones had Divine honours given them, instead of statues or images. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6. in the beginning; and Maimonides, of the Worship of the Planets, chap. 6. sect. 8—10. and Dionys. Vossius's annotations there.)

Which the Lord thy God hateth.] Hence it sufficiently appears, that this was an idolatrous practice; which is more odious to God than any thing else. And thus the Israelites we see understood it, being ready to take arms against their brethren on the other side Jordan, when they heard they had erected an altar there (taking it to be such a structure as is here forbidden); but were appeased when they understood, that it was not intended for worship, (Josh. xxii. 18.)

CHAP. XVII.

Ver. 1. THOU shalt not sacrifice unto the Lord thy God any bullock, or sheep, wherein is any blemish.] Having warned them, as he had done often, against idolatrous practices, he here interposes a caution against profaneness in the worship of the true God: for it was a great disrespect to him, to offer him any thing that was not perfect, the heathens being ashamed of such sacrifices.

Wherein is any blemish.] Of this see Lev. xxii. 20, &c.

Or any evil-favouredness.] In the Hebrew, any evil thing, or matter; that is, if it had any disease, or was sick.

For that is an abomination unto the Lord thy God.] This is more than is said in Leviticus, where the words are, for it shall not be acceptable for you. For here he expresses the greatest disdain and abhorrence of such sacrifices.

Ver. 2. If there be found among you, within any of thy gates which the Lord thy God giveth thee.] In any cities or towns within their country.

Man or woman that hath wrought wickedness in the sight of the Lord thy God.] Now he returns to the business of idolatry; which is the wickedness here said to be wrought, as appears by the next words.

In transgressing his covenant.] For this was the principal part of the covenant, that they should have no other gods but him; (Exod. xx. 22, 23.) upon this all depended; so that the whole covenant was void, if they served other gods. Which was so foul a sin, that he would have none spared, who were guilty of it. Which is the reason, as Maimonides thinks, (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 37.) why he here saith, man or woman, because men are naturally more tender towards the female sex, and inclinable to be favourable to them; against which he warns them in case of idolatry, and of profaning the sabbath; in which two cases only he uses these words.

He had shewn in the thirteenth chapter, what they should do with him that seduced others to idolatry, whether he were a pretended prophet, or a private man, (ver. 1. 9, 10.) And then, what should be done with a whole city that was seduced, (ver. 12, 13, &c.) And now he shews how they should proceed against any particular person who apostatized from God.

Ver. 3. And hath gone and served other gods, and worshipped them, either the sun, or moon, or any of the host of heaven.] The most ancient idolatry (of which Abarbinel makes account there were ten sorts) was the worship of the heavenly bodies, as I have observed before, iv. 19. and see Job xxxi. 26. The forenamed doctor, indeed, places first the worship of angels; about which I will not dispute; but only observe, that by condemning those who worshipped the host of heaven, though very glorious creatures, Moses suggests plainly enough how vile they were who worshipped images of wood and stone.

Which I have not commanded.] This is a way of speaking in this language, importing the quite contrary, which God hath forbidden, and that most strictly. (See Prov. xvii. 21. xxiv. 23. and many other places.)

Ver. 4. And it be told thee.] Thou hast had information of such wickedness.

And thou hast heard it, and inquired diligently.] Upon information, they were to make diligent search, whether the report were true or not.

And, behold, it be true, and the thing certain.] They were not to proceed upon rumours, nor yet to slight them; but endeavour to be satisfied, whether or not, there was ground for them; and if upon examination they found there was no doubt of the truth of the thing, to do as is here directed.

That such abomination is wrought in Israel.] So idolatry is frequently called. (See xiii. 14.)

Ver. 5. Then thou shalt bring forth that man or that woman, which have committed that wicked thing, unto thy gates.] Set them before the court of judgment in the city to which they belonged, (see xvi. 18.) For particular persons were tried and sentenced in the lower courts, but a tribe or a city, accused of idolatry, only by the highest court of all; as Maimonides and the rest of the Jewish doctors inform us. (See Selden, lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 4. n. 3. and cap. 5. n. 1.)

And shalt stone them with stones that they die.] This was the punishment of a particular person, as a city fallen to idolatry was to be killed with the sword; and a false prophet, who seduced others to idolatry, to be strangled. (See xiii. 5.)

Ver. 6. At the mouth of two witnesses, or three witnesses, shall he that is worthy of death be put to death.] No man could be convicted but by two witnesses, at least, and those of a competent age, of good fame, and not convicted themselves of having borne false witness, &c. Many other qualifications, of lesser moment, the Jews required in a witness; which Mr. Selden reports, and the reason of them, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 13. n. 11.

But at the mouth of one witness he shall not be put to death.] Because, though the witness was never so credible, it was possible he might be mistaken. But it was not likely that two or three honest men, agreeing in the same testimony, should all be deceived. Yet in pecuniary matters, the Hebrew doctors say, the testimony of one credible witness was sufficient to put a man to his oath for his purgation. And they set a mark of infamy upon him, who, in such matters as are here spoken of, had such a single witness against him. (See Maccoth, cap. 1. sect. 8. and J. Coch's annotations there.)

Ver. 7. The hands of the witnesses shall be first upon him, to put him to death.] This was great reason, that they might thereby still confirm the truth and certainty of their testimony, by being the first executioners of the sentence; which no men would easily venture to be, who were not sure they had testified the truth.

And afterward the hands of all the people.] From hence some infer, that he was to be put to death at a public feast.

So shalt thou put away the evil from among you.] See xiii. 5.

Ver. 8. If there arise a matter too hard for thee in judgment.] Now he returns to speak of the courts of judgment, which he had ordered to be erected in all their cities, when they came into the land of Canaan, (xvi. 18.) who might find some causes to be so difficult that they could not determine them.

Between blood and blood.] The Jews, I think, interpret this absurdly concerning menstruous women, and the tokens of virginity, (see Mr. Selden, lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 2.) when there is a plain and obvious meaning of these words, That there might be a doubt whether a man had committed wilful murder, or only casual, and, consequently, whether he should have the benefit of the city of refuge, or be taken from it.

Between plea and plea.] As the former words belong to criminal causes, so these to civil; such as suits about debts, or purchases of lands or houses, &c.

Between stroke and stroke.] It doth not seem reasonable to me, that this should be interpreted of the leprosy (which is often called a plague, or stroke), though the Jews so understand it, for that was to be judged solely by the priests; whereas he speaks also of other judges: therefore the meaning is, concerning any wound or hurt that was done to a man in his body. About which, if the judges could not agree, but were divided in their opinions, either about the fact itself, or about the punishment to be inflicted, an appeal was to be made to a higher court.

Being matters of controversy.] Or contention and strife; that is, disputes arising about them, which could not be determined by the judges in those courts below.

Within thy gates.] Where God commanded judges and officers to be settled, (xvi. 18.) And therefore here he speaks of the inferior courts of judgment, that were in the lesser cities of their several tribes.

Then thou shalt arise, and get thee up unto the place which the Lord thy God shall choose.] Where the supreme court was settled in the chief city of the kingdom. While they continued in the wilderness, the captains of thousands, and hundreds, and fifties, and tens (whom Moses constituted by the advice of Jethro), judged the causes of the people under Moses himself, to whom God joined seventy persons for his assistance; all hard causes being brought before him. But this authority of the captains lasted no longer than during their pilgrimage in the wilderness; for when they came to Canaan, the law, as I now observed, required judges and officers to be ordained in every city; who, if there fell any difference about the law, are here ordered to repair to the place where the sanctuary was, for there the highest court sat, as the successors of Moses, and his consistory of seventy elders, (mentioned Numb. xi. 16. 24, &c.) who judged all difficult causes while he lived.

Ver. 9. And thou shalt come unto the priests the Levites, and unto the judge.] Who must be supposed to be resident in this place, where the sanctuary was. And these words, the priests the Levites, the Jews understand as if he had said, the priests of the tribe of Levi, or the sons of Levi; for so he speaks in xxi. 5. And Mr. Selden produces a great many other instances of the like phrase, (lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 8. n. 2, 3.) and shews they are so described (as the Jews think) to exclude all others that had been priests, before God took the sons of Aaron peculiarly to serve him in this office. But the Levites, as well as priests, they unanimously agree, were capable to be members of this great Sanhedrin; which, they all likewise say, did not consist only of priests and Levites, but of any other persons of other tribes, who were fit to be promoted to this dignity. Nay, they say, if there was not one priest or Levite in the court, it was a lawful judicature; for the high-priest himself, no more than any man else, had a place here, merely for his birth, unless his learning in the law was answerable: so Maimonides and others. And those other members who were not priests, nor Levites, they think are comprehended under the word judge, which, though it be in the singular number, may be thought to signify more than one, as appears from xix. 17. where it is said expressly, they shall bring the controversy there mentioned, before the priests and the judges. And farther, that judge, after the manner of this language, may signify judges, Constantine L'Empereur gathers from ver. 12. where priest in the singular number is used for those who are here called priests in the plural. (Annot. in Corn. Bertram, p. 389.)

But howsoever this be, it seems to me, that though the priests and Levites were not the only persons of whom this high court consisted (the members of which might be chosen out of any tribe where they could find men qualified), yet they are here first mentioned, because they were likely to be the most capable persons to exercise this authority, especially in the first constitution of this commonwealth, when they were newly entered into Canaan. For all other persons were then busily employed in looking after the inheritance that was fallen to them, and settling the affairs of their several families; whereby they were rendered less able to attend unto this weighty office. But the tribe of Levi having no inheritance among them (as is often repeated in these books), and no care about husbandry, and such-like affairs, had a full leisure both to study the laws of God and to judge according to them; especially being appointed by God to teach Jacob his judgments and Israel his law, xxxiii. 10. Besides, this court being settled at the place of God's worship, where a great many priests and Levites always necessarily attended, they were most ready, without any inconvenience to themselves, to execute this office of judges, having their maintenance from the public, which no other persons had. But otherwise, as I said, they had no more right than other men to be members of this court, which we cannot certainly say consisted of seventy judges, together with their nasi, i. e. their prince, or president; nor that they always sat at the place here appointed: for there were sometimes great troubles in the land, and they were under the power of their enemies, which extremely disturbed their government, and made it necessary for God to raise them up extraordinary judges, because the power of this court was broken in pieces. So Mr. Selden himself acknowledges, that there were great intermissions of their sitting in the times of Antiochus Epiphanes, and of Herod the Great, (lib. ii. de Synedriis, cap. 14. n. 3.) And therefore, why not in the times when they were oppressed by the Moabites, Ammonites, Philistines, and other cruel neighbours, in the days of the judges? and thus Grotius, Hermannus Conringius (to name no more), here understand the word judge, who is joined with the priest and Levites.

And unto the judge.] The forenamed authors thus translate this verse, Thou shalt come unto the priests the Levites, or unto the judge that shall be in those days. Where by judge they understand such as Othniel, Ehud, Gideon, Jephthah, Samson, Samuel, and others, whom God raised up when they were oppressed by their enemies, and in great confusions, to govern his people; which they did with the highest authority, being equal to kings, save only that they kept not royal state or equipage, but are plainly called by that name, Judg. xvii. 6. xix. 1. xxi. 25. Now, though the priests and Levites (i. e. that court, of which they made a considerable part) were the ordinary supreme judges of controversies, yet the judge, when God raised one up, was endued with an extraordinary power above theirs; to whom the people therefore resorted for his decision. For just as all ordinary magistrates among the Romans gave place to a dictator, when they had one, so all the Hebrew magistrates did to such a judge, when God appointed him, who determined all manner of controversies, as, at other times, the other judges, whether priests or others, were wont to do. (See Herman. Conringius de Republ. Ebræorum, sect. 39.)

I know but one objection against this, which is, that those extraordinary judges were not fixed, as far as we can find, in the place where the sanctuary was; unless we may judge of all the rest by Eli and Samuel, who seem to have been settled there. But we must consider that they were not confined by their commission, which was not grounded on this law, to any one certain place, but left at liberty to live where they thought most convenient for the discharge of their trust, in the reformation of the people. And the truth of what I said concerning their supreme power, plainly appears in Samuel, who went up and down the country executing judgment, when Shiloh was destroyed, and had no court, like that which the Jews speak of, to assist him. But when he needed assistance, he appointed his sons to be judges, (1 Sam. viii. 1.) of whom, when the elders complained, (ver. 4.) because they did not discharge their duty well, it was to himself, and not to any other persons; and they desire not a Sanhedrin, but a king to judge them, (ver. 5.) Which petition we do not find that he communicated to the Sanhedrin, but only unto God; nor is any mention made of them in the choice of a king, or, after he was chosen, in the history of their kings, till Jehoshaphat's time, no more than there is in the books of Joshua and Judges; where we read, that when there was no king (that is, judge) in Israel, every man did what was right in his own eyes; which is a sign that there wanted such a court to keep them in order. After the time of Jehoshaphat, who settled judges in every city, (as I observed, xvi. 18.) they continued, it is plain, till the captivity; but what number there was of them we do not know. After the captivity, Ezra and Nehemiah seem to have done all themselves, (see Neh. ix. and x.) Which makes it very probable, that though there were judges appointed according to the direction of this law, yet the exercise of their power was often interrupted by the great changes which were in that nation; and that there was no such Sanhedrin as the Talmudists describe till the time of the Maccabees. For the very name of Sanhedrin plainly shews its original to have been when the Greek tongue was common among the Jews; and that was, when the kings of Syria and Egypt (who were of the Macedonian race) had the chief power in Palestine. (See Conringius, in the forenamed book, sect. 37.)

And inquire.] They were to lay the cause before this high court, and desire their opinion in it.

And they shall shew the sentence of judgment.] They were bound to determine the controversy; and whatsoever sentence they gave, it was to stand good till it was reversed by other judges of the same authority; for the Jews (who understand all this of the great Sanhedrin, and scan every syllable with great nicety) will have the words just before [that shall be in those days] to signify that every sentence must hold in the time when it is given: so that if this court determined a matter, which in after-times, by other judges of the same court, should be judged otherways, that second sentence was to stand, being the opinion of those days. For this sentence was, in their judgment, the meaning of the law, by which they were all to be governed; and, if there was no tradition in the case, they judged themselves as well as they could.

Ver. 10. And thou shalt do according to the sentence which they of that place.] That is, the high court which sits there, or the judge who is in those days.

Which the Lord shall choose.] The Jews, who understand this only of the Sanhedrin, say, it was not lawful for them to judge causes, at least not those which were capital, in any other place. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 15. n. 6, 7. 10.)

Shall shew thee.] Shall pronounce.

And thou shalt observe to do according to all that they inform thee.] Some fancy that he speaks to the inferior judges, who brought the cause thither to have the opinion of this highest court, who were then to pronounce sentence according to it; but whoever brought the controversy before this court (when the inferior could not determine it), they gave the sentence, in which he requires the contending parties to acquiesce, and to do according to their determination; which did not concern questions of faith, as if men were to believe whatsoever they should teach them, but such controversies as are mentioned ver. 8. about civil or criminal matters, which they were finally to determine; so that men should not farther controvert the matter, but rest in their decisions. For in all governments there must be an end of suits, somewhere or other; and God required all his people to submit to the sentence of this court: for so the words run in the Hebrew, And thou shalt do according to the sentence which they shall shew thee, from the place which the Lord thy God shall choose; that is, from the supreme court of judicature, which resided where God himself did. For if men had been permitted to disagree to their sentence, the very end and use of this court had been taken away; as Maimonides speaks, in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 41.

Ver. 11. According to the sentence of the law which they shall teach thee.] In the Hebrew, According to the mouth, or the word of the law, which they shall teach thee; that is, according to the interpretation which they gave of the law.

And according to the judgment which they shall tell thee.] That is, according to the order or decree which they made thereupon.

Shalt thou do.] Pay, suppose, the money, which they judged to be due to another man: for he doth not speak of their doing whatsoever they bade them (as if they could control the commands of God), but of obeying the sentence of this court, about those matters which were in question between one man and another, (ver. 8.) who were not to be judges in their own case, but rest in the judgment of those whom God had made the supreme interpreters of his law.

Thou shalt not decline from the sentence which they shall shew thee, &c.] They were not to make the least alteration in their sentence: for though they might think it was wrong, and the senate perhaps did really err, and be better informed afterward, (which the law supposes, and in that case orders an expiatory sacrifice, Lev. iv. 13.) yet it was not lawful for any man to act contrary to their present decree, nor to teach the contrary, whatsoever his private opinion might be.

Ver. 12. And the man that will do presumptuously, and will not hearken.] This they understand, not barely of a private man, that would not stand to their sentence, but of an elder, or inferior judge, who presumed to contradict it; as Mr. Selden shews, lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 3.

Unto the priest.] It is commonly thought, as I observed, ver. 8. that the singular number is here put for the plural; and that the meaning is, if any man would not hearken to the highest court of judgment, which consisted commonly of a great many priests, he should die for his contempt: but they have a great deal of reason on their side, who insist upon the letter of this word priest, and of that which follows, or the judge (understanding both of single persons), and take the high-priest only to be here meant; who seems to be described in the next words, that stands to minister there before the Lord thy God. For when God did not raise up a judge to govern his people, the high-priest was the supreme governor under God until the days of David; and so he was after the captivity. Hence it is, as Grotius observes, (lib. de Imperio Summarum Potestatum circa Sacra, cap. 9. sect. 4.) that cohen is a name common to priests and princes: for, among a great many nations anciently, he shews, the priests had the highest power; particularly among the Cappadocians (Strabo, who was of that country, saith), the sacerdotal dignity was next to the regal; but howsoever this word be interpreted, the crime here mentioned was contumacy, in not submitting to the sentence of the highest authority, whether it were vested in one person or more, whereby the government was in danger to be broken; and therefore God orders such a person to be put to death.

Or the judge.] See before, ver. 9.

Even that man shall die.] The Jews, who interpret this, as I said, of a judge in inferior courts, who presumed to contradict the judgment of the supreme court, have tempered the severity of this law by several explications and exceptions; which have regard, either to the manner of passing this decree by the highest court, which an inferior disobeyed (and that was when a cause came before them upon an appeal, for it was not so criminal to disobey every sentence of the supreme court, but only such as these), or to the place where it was made, which was to be no where else but at God's dwelling-place, or to the things about which the decree was made; which some will have to be only weighty matters: and the act of contumacy also was considered; for he was not put to death, they say, unless in open court he declared a contrary sentence. The death he suffered was strangling; and he could suffer in no other place but where this high court sat. (See Selden, of all these, in the place beforementioned, n. 2—6.) And it may be farther observed, that the prophets themselves were subject to the power and jurisdiction of this high court, by whom they might be sentenced to capital punishment, if they taught contrary to the law of God. But our Mr. Thorndike makes a doubt, whether the constitution which the Jewish writers mention about a rebellious elder (as they call him who taught any thing contrary to the determination of this supreme court), was ever in force or not? For it was made, because of the differences between the schools of Hillel and Shammai, who lived not long before our Saviour's time; when, it appears by the gospel, that nation had lost the power of life and death. (See Rites of the Church, chap. 5. p. 256.)

And thou shalt put away the evil from Israel.] This may refer either to the evil person, or to the great scandal and dangerous example he gave, by resisting the highest authority, and thereby breaking the bond of unity and peace.

Ver. 13. And all the people shall hear and fear, and do no more presumptuously.] This punishment was intended to strike a terror into all the people, that they should not adventure to oppose the supreme authority. And for this end the offender was to be kept in custody, as R. Aquiba understood this, till the next great feast (either of the Passover, or Pentecost, or tabernacles), and then executed, when the whole nation, i. e. all the males were present. This Mr. Selden observes (in the forenamed place, n. 7.) is the most received opinion; though R. Jehuda saith, they did not make the sentence sharper by a long delay, but executed it presently: and for the farther publication of it, they sent letters to all the tribes and cities of Israel, to give notice, that such a man was executed at such a time for this crime. (See Selden there, n. 8.)

Ver. 14. And when thou comest into the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, and shalt possess it, and shalt dwell therein.] When they had conquered the land of Canaan, and were settled in it.

And shalt say, I will set a king over me.] The Jews commonly, from this and the next verse, fancy that God commanded them to make a king when they came to the land of Canaan, and had a quiet possession of it; following herein the Gemara of the Sanhedrin, cap. 2. Insomuch, that they have presumed to make this an affirmative precept, "a king of the people should be chosen;" and quote this place for it. To which some learned men among Christians have seemed to incline; particularly Petrus Cunæus, lib. ii. de Republ. Hebr. cap. 14. and Guil. Schickardus, in his Jus Regium, cap. 1. Theor. 1. But Abarbinel himself contradicts this; and so doth Josephus, who observes, that God intended they should keep their present government; but if they would have a king, he should be one of their brethren. For thus he interprets this place, (lib. i. Antiq. cap. 8.) that they should not affect any other government, but love the present, having the law for their master, and living according to it; ἀρκεῖ γὰρ ὁ Θεὸς ἡγεμὼν εἶναι, for it is sufficient that God is your ruler. And then he adds, But if you desire to have a king, ἔστω μὲν οὗτος ὁμόφυλος, let him be one of your own nation, as it here follows in the next verse.

Like as all the nations that are about me.] Such as the Edomites, who had been governed by kings before the days of Moses. (See Gen. xxxvi. 31.)

Ver. 15. Thou shalt in any wise set him king over thee.] Install, and receive him into the throne.

Whom the Lord thy God shall choose.] They could not elect whom they pleased, but the first king, at least, was to be appointed by God himself, who was their supreme governor. So the people understood it, when they desired Samuel, who was their chief ruler under God, to make them a king, (1 Sam. viii. 5.) but durst not to presume to set one up of themselves. And to confirm them in this opinion, Samuel saith to Saul, (1 Sam. x. 1.) "The Lord hath anointed thee to be captain over his inheritance;" and saith to all the people, (ver. 24.) "See ye him whom the Lord hath chosen." And accordingly, when the lot was to be cast, to shew who was to be their king, Samuel bids all the tribes present themselves before the Lord, (ver. 19.) And when it fell upon Saul, and they could not find him, they inquired of the Lord, and the Lord answered where he was, (ver. 22.) In like manner, when Saul was rejected, the Lord himself appointed David to be anointed their king, and settled that authority in his family. And to determine which of his sons should have it, God himself appointed his immediate successor, viz. Solomon. For so David declares to all the princes and the great men whom he assembled before his death; "Of all my sons, the Lord hath chosen Solomon to sit upon the throne of the kingdom of the Lord God of Israel," (1 Chron. xxviii. 5.) And again, (xxix. 1.) "David said unto all the congregation, Solomon my son, whom alone God hath chosen, is yet young," &c. But though it was thus in the beginning of this kingdom, yet God intended at length to make it hereditary, as appears from ver. 20. of this chapter.

One from among thy brethren shalt thou set over thee.] i. e. Saith the tradition, mentioned by the Jews out of Tosiphta, the most select and choice person that could be found, not one of mean extraction or employment. This they fancy is meant by from among thy brethren.

Thou mayest not set a stranger over thee, which is not thy brother.] This the Jews extend to all offices whatsoever, as Maimonides reports their sense. (See Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 20. p. 647.) And by thy brother some of them understand one that was an Israelite, both by father and mother; though others think it sufficient, if a king was an Israelite by the mother's side. See there, cap. 22. which in his book de Succession. ad Pontificat. lib. ii. he shews was sufficient for any dignity among the Israelites, but only the priesthood. See also, lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 9. n. 6. where he observes the Talmudists say, the great Sanhedrin was to see that no king but one thus qualified was set over the people; which, when there was such a court, may be allowed to be true; though all the power which they ascribe to their Sanhedrin over their kings, is by no means to be admitted; but is an apparent figment: for it is manifest out of the Bible, that their kings had that very power which they ascribe to the Sanhedrin; particularly, it is notorious that Solomon, by his own power, put Abiathar out of the office of high-priest, (1 Kings ii. 6. 26.) which judgment the Talmudists say belonged only to the great Sanhedrin. In like manner other kings judged prophets; which they appropriate to the same court.

Ver. 16. But he shall not multiply horses to himself.] There is no certain number determined; but the Jews well resolve, that he was not to keep them for mere pomp and state, but only so many as were for use and service; to draw his chariot, for instance, and for the guard of his person; but he was to take care that he did not burden his people by too many, under this, or any other pretence: and therefore not to keep up a body of horse for war. For among the Jews their armies consisted altogether of footmen; there being no breed of horses in that country; and their people, who were all husbandmen and shepherds, being accustomed to labour, and to run as swiftly as a horse, (2 Sam. ii. 18. xviii. 19. 22, &c.) Certain it is, that in the days of David they had no horsemen in their army; for when Absalom lost the battle and fled, it was upon a mule that he endeavoured to make his escape. And though Solomon was so prodigiously rich, that he was able to maintain forty thousand stalls of horses for his chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen, (1 Kings iv. 26.) yet succeeding kings could not keep up such an expense; but when they had occasion sent for succours from Egypt, which commonly consisted of horsemen. Now one of the reasons the Jews give why their king was not to multiply horses, is, lest he should be puffed up with pride; for a horse being a stately creature, his rider is often swollen with a high conceit of himself, as more than one of the heathen have observed. (See Bochart, in his Hierozoicon, lib. ii. cap. 9.) Nachmanides gives another good reason, lest he should confide and trust in the power of his horsemen more than in God. (See Schickard, in his Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 3. Theor. 10.) But the chief reason is given by Moses himself in the next words, Lest they should be tempted to go to Egypt, with which country it was dangerous to have familiarity.

Nor cause the people to return to Egypt, to the end that he should multiply horses.] Send his people thither to buy horses for him, it being a country that abounded with them, as Judea did with asses. For when Sheshak, king of Egypt (whom the Greek writers call Sesostris), came against Jerusalem, there were threescore thousand horsemen in his army, (2 Chron. xii. 3.) Which shews how they abounded with horses in that country in those days, though in aftertimes they did not care to breed them. They might indeed have horses out of other countries, as well as Egypt, but not so easily, nor so good: which made Solomon send thither, and Pharaoh set a great price upon them; because he knew their value, and that they could not furnish themselves so easily with them elsewhere, (1 Kings x. 28, 29.)

Forasmuch as the Lord hath said unto you, Ye shall henceforth return no more that way.] Or the first words may be rendered, forasmuch as the Lord saith unto you, &c. as he did now by him, that they should not maintain traffic with the Egyptians, at least while they continued idolaters. We read, indeed, that many Jews went thither, and Urijah the prophet fled thither: (Jer. xxvi. 21.) of which the Jews give this account: first, some say this was but a temporary constitution, which was not to last always: secondly, they distinguish about the way of returning thither; conceiving that they might not go thither out of the land of Israel, but they might out of another country whither they were driven. Maimonides thinks they might go thither as merchants, but not fix their dwelling there. But the true meaning is, that they might not voluntarily go thither upon any account, at least while they remained, as I said, so corrupted in their religion and manners, as they were at this present: for there is an express law, Lev. xviii. 3. "According to the works of the Egyptians ye shall not do." (See Schickardus, in the forenamed place, p. 78.) Whence those words of the prophet Isaiah, where, when he saith the land of Israel was full of horses, he adds, their land also is full of idols, (Isa. ii. 7, 8.) For by multiplying the one, they multiplied the other. And, therefore, though David did reserve some chariots and horsemen, which he took to his conquests, for his own use, yet no great number, (2 Sam. viii. 4.) But still great men rode upon mules, (2 Sam. xviii. 9. 1 Kings i. 33. 38. 41.) as they had done in the days of the judges, (Judg. v. 10. x. 4. xii. 14.)

Ver. 17. Neither shall he multiply wives to himself.] This is not a prohibition to take more wives than one, but not to have an excessive number, after the manner of the eastern kings, whom Solomon seems to have imitated: I see no ground for what the Jews say, that he might have eighteen. (See Schickard, in the book abovenamed, cap. 3. Theor. 9. Selden's Uxor. Hebr. lib. i. cap. 8. Buxtorf. de Sponsal. par. i. sect. 40.) For the proof which R. Solomon and Bechin give of it is very weak; which is, that David having already six wives, (2 Sam. v. 13.) the prophet tells him, if he had not offended God, he would moreover have given him such and such things, i. e. say they, twice as many wives, (2 Sam. xii. 8.) Much less is there any ground for what they say, that if he took more than his number, he was to be scourged by the authority of the Sanhedrin, as he was, they pretend, for the breach of any of these precepts here mentioned. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 9. n. 5.) Which Grotius, indeed, endeavours to soften, by affirming that these lashes were no disgrace to him, because he received them voluntarily, in token of his repentance; and therefore was not scourged by the common executioner, but by such a person as he himself chose to give this correction; and he received also such a number of stripes as he himself pleased, and no more, (lib. i. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 3. sect. 20.) But this is directly against Maimonides, who saith, in downright words, that the Sanhedrin appointed this chastisement; as Selden observes in another place, (lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 9. n. 5.) And there is no example in the whole book of God of any such jurisdiction which the Sanhedrin had over their kings; but all this may well be looked upon as a mere invention of the Jewish doctors, to magnify the power of their great council.

That his heart turn not away.] From all serious business and employment, whilst he was caressing and studying to please a multitude of women: some understand it, lest they turned his heart away from God, and the duties of piety, of which there was great danger, if he married worshippers of strange gods, as Solomon did. Otherwise, I should think it might be interpreted, of turning his thoughts from minding his people, and their good and welfare; which must needs suffer much, when they were burdened with a great company of wives, who were to be richly maintained and provided for.

Neither shall he greatly multiply to himself silver and gold.] No more, saith the Sanhedrin, (cap. 2.) than would pay stipends to his servants, &c. Others of them scan the words more nicely; and observe, that, first, he is forbidden to multiply gold and silver greatly, that is, to content himself with moderate riches, and not set himself to heap up treasure, which could not be done commonly without great oppression of his subjects. And, secondly, he is forbidden to multiply them to himself: but for the public benefit he might lay up money in the treasury at the temple, though in his own coffers, for his private interest, he might not. See Schickard in his Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 3. Theor. 11. where he produces their answer to this question,—How should the king be able to manage a war, or do any other great thing, if he did not furnish himself with good store of gold and silver? He might, say they, fill the public exchequer, though not his own private bags: and that for two reasons; first, lest he should wax proud and haughty, when his purse swelled: and secondly, lest he should be tempted to squeeze his subjects, and exact more from them than they were able to bear; as Solomon seems to have done, whose treasurer the people stoned, (1 Kings xii. 18.)

Ver. 18. And it shall be, when he sitteth on the throne of the kingdom, that he shall write him a copy of this law in a book.] Not only of this book of Deuteronomy, but of the whole law, and that with his own hand, as a means to fix it more in his mind: insomuch, that though a copy was left him by his father, he was, notwithstanding, to transcribe one himself, as the Jews say, in the Gemara Sanhedrin, (cap. 2. sect. 13.) All this is very agreeable to these words; but whether he was bound, if he had not written a copy before he was king (as every private Israelite, they say, was bound to do), to write two when he sat on the throne, may be doubted; for it cannot, without violence, be drawn from these words; and their authority is not sufficient to warrant it: they give, indeed, a plausible reason for it, that the one he was to carry about with him whithersoever he went, and to read in the other at home: but why one copy might not serve for both these purposes, I do not see.

Out of that which is before the priests the Levites.] He was not to write one word of it out of his memory merely, or any private man's copy, but out of the book which was in the sanctuary, where the original and uncorrupted copy was in the custody of God's ministers: there are a great many rules the Jews give about the right writing of this copy, which may be seen in Guil. Schickardi Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 2. Theor. 5.

Ver. 19. And it shall be with him.] Wheresoever he was, either in the camp, or at home, or in any other place, provided it was pure, and free from filth, as the Jews limit it. (See there, Theor. 6.)

And he shall read therein all the days of his life.] Diligently study it, not spending his time, as Maimonides glosses, in drinking and making merry, but in learning the law of God. (See there, p. 53.) From the neglect of this precept, their kings became so ignorant of the laws of God, and of their obligation to observe them, that, in the days of the good king Josiah, he was strangely started at what he heard read out of this book of the law, when it was found in the temple, where it had long lain without any knowledge of it.

That he may learn to fear the Lord his God.] Be preserved in the true religion.

To keep all the words of this law, and these statutes, to do them.] Be acquainted with his whole duty, and perform it constantly. (See Josh. i. 8.)

Ver. 20. That his heart be not lifted up above his brethren.] Not imagining himself to be above all laws, nor slighting his subjects as unworthy of his notice, but taking a due care to promote their happiness. "For as the Scriptures (saith Maimonides) provided the king should have great honour done him, obliging all to reverence him, so it commands him to be lowly in heart, and not to carry himself insolently: let him be gracious, and full of clemency to little and great, so shall he go out, and come in, with the love and good wishes of them all." Unto which Nachmanides adds this pious reflection: "If the Scripture deters kings from pride and haughtiness of heart; how unbecoming is it in other men, who are far inferior to them?" &c.

And that he turn not aside from the commandment, to the right hand or the left.] Neither by changing the laws, on pretence of making better; nor by abrogating them, on pretence of their inconveniency: but where the Divine law was not clear, or where nothing was there defined, he might by his authority make new constitutions, as David and Solomon did, as well in sacred as in civil matters.

To the end that he may prolong his days in his kingdom, he, and his children, in the midst of Israel.] This shews that God intended to establish a successive right in that family to which he chose to give the kingdom, if they continued in a constant observation of his laws. And, indeed, there is no way to establish and perpetuate a family in the throne, like the due observation of laws, though they be but human, not Divine laws: for, as Aristotle truly said, "He that commands the law shall govern all (i. e. all things be ordered according to law), δοκεῖ κελεύειν ἄρχειν τὸν Θεὸν καὶ τοὺς νόμους, seems to command that God should rule, and the laws: but he that bids a man rule without laws (according to his own will), προστίθησι θηρίον, sets up a beast to govern." And above all things, he ought to endeavour to win the love of his subjects, by humility and clemency; as the same Aristotle taught Alexander, if we may believe R. Jedaja, in his book called Mibchar Happeninim, where he reports a letter of his to that great prince, advising him to gain the affection of his people by a gentle government, which is far better than to rule tyrannically by force and violence: "For to what purpose is it to have possession of their bodies, when the true possession is to be master of their hearts? get possession of their hearts by clemency, and that will draw their bodies along with them."

CHAP. XVIII.

Ver. 1. THE priests the Levites, and all the tribe of Levi.] Or, even the whole tribe of Levi. (See xvii. 9.)

They shall have no inheritance with Israel.] As had been said Numb. xviii. 20. and here in this book, x. 7. Which made it the more necessary Moses should remind the people of that maintenance God had appointed for them; which, unless it was duly given them, religion could not be supported; and consequently the government (of which he had been speaking) would be quite confounded.

They shall eat the offerings of the Lord made by fire.] Not the burnt-offerings, which were wholly God's; but all other offerings, of which a share was appointed for the priests the sons of Aaron, (Numb. xviii. 9—11. 18, 19.)

And his inheritance.] That is, the inheritance of the Lord, of whom he spoke before, who had reserved certain oblations to himself, and bestowed them upon the priests: They are mentioned Numb. xviii. 8, 9. and ver. 12—15. where he first speaks of the first-fruits, and the first-born, which were all brought unto the Lord, and by him given to them. In like manner, all the tithes of the land are said to be a heave-offering unto the Lord, ver. 24. where he saith, I have given them to the Levites to inherit. So these two, the offerings of the Lord made by fire, and his inheritance, comprehend all that belonged to his ministers, whether priests or Levites.

Ver. 2. Therefore shall they have no inheritance among their brethren; the Lord is their inheritance, as he hath said unto them.] The Lord had given them that part and portion of the offerings which were peculiarly his own; and therefore is said to be their inheritance, because they enjoyed his inheritance, as these holy things are called in the foregoing words. (See Numb. xviii. 20. 24. and Josh. xiii. 14. 33.)

Ver. 3. And this shall be the priest's due from the people.] Besides those things that God gave them, which peculiarly belonged to him.

From them that offer a sacrifice.] Of peace-offerings, which are sometimes called simply a sacrifice, (Lev. xvii.

Digitized by Microsoft®

5. 8. Numb. xv. 3.) in which the people had a considerable interest.

Whether it be ox, or sheep.] Under sheep are comprehended goats also, as I have observed. (See Lev. iii.)

And they shall give unto the priest the shoulder.] Together with the breast; as we read Lev. vii. 32—34.

And the two cheeks, and the maw.] These were not given to the priests before, but were now added to their portion, being accounted the best part of the beasts: for, as the cheeks were the best part of the head, and the shoulder and breast the best of the other members of the body, so the maw was the principal part of the entrails, as Maimonides observes, par. iii. More Nevochim, cap. 39.

By the maw is meant the stomach; and in beasts that chew the cud, who have four stomachs, that which is called by the Greeks ἤνυστρον, viz. the lowest of them, which had this name, because the digestion which is begun in the other, is here perfected and completed: and it appears that this part of the entrails was accounted by the ancients a great dainty, as Bochartus proves out of Aristophanes, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 45. p. 505.

Ver. 4. The first-fruits also of thy corn, of thy wine, and of thy oil.] See Numb. xviii. 12. To which it may be useful to add this out of Maimonides (who hath distinctly represented the order wherein all oblations were made), that after the fruits of the earth were gathered, every man was bound to bring a fiftieth part of them, as a first-fruit to the priests, which was called trumah gedolah, the great oblation, of which Moses speaks in this place: and next of all, he separated a tenth part of the whole from the rest, which was maasher rishon, the first tithe, and given to the Levites, (Numb. xviii. 24.) Then, out of what remained, another tenth part was taken, called maaser sheni, the second tithe, which was every third year given to the poor, and in the two intermediate years, spent in feasting at the house of God, (Deut. xiv. 28.). So that, for instance, if a man had pressed out a hundred and two logs of oil, he sent two of them as first-fruits to the priest, and then ten more, as tithe to the Levites, and deducted nine parts more out of the residue for the poor; by which it appears, that one-and-twenty parts of a hundred and two, that is, a fifth part of the whole, was separated for pious and charitable uses. (See Schickard, in his Jus Regium, cap. 4. Theor. 15.)

And the first of the fleece of thy sheep shalt thou give him.] This is comprehended under first-fruits, but never particularly mentioned before now: and though the quantity is not mentioned, yet the Jews have adventured to determine, that less than one fleece in sixty was not accepted. For so they say of all other first-fruits, that a sixtieth part of the whole was the least that any man gave; and he was accounted a covetous man if he gave no more; they that were indifferently good, giving a fiftieth part, and liberal persons the fortieth. By this means the priests were provided with clothes, as by other offerings with food. And the wool also, as they call it, of goats (which were shorn in these countries) is comprehended under the fleece of sheep.

Ver. 5. For the Lord thy God hath chosen him out of all thy tribes, to stand to minister in the name of the Lord.] This was the office of a priest, to offer sacrifices unto God, and to bless the people in his name.

Him and his sons for ever.] The family of Aaron, of which he is principally speaking. Who, when they were few in number, all ministered unto God; but afterward they took their courses of attendance. And, as the Jews say, there were eight courses before Moses died; four of the family of Eleazar, and as many of Ithamar's, which in David's time were enlarged into four-and-twenty courses. (See Selden, lib. i. de Succession. in Pontificat. cap. 1.)

Ver. 6. And if a Levite.] By a Levite he seems here to mean a priest. (See ver. 1.) For they only could minister unto God, and the Levites ministered unto them.

Come from any of thy gates out of all Israel.] From any city, in any tribe of Israel.

Where he sojourned.] i. e. Leave the country where he hath been wont to live.

And come with all the desire of his mind unto the place which the Lord shall choose.] With a sincere affection to devote himself to the perpetual service of God at the sanctuary; so that, instead of coming in his course, he would always wait there, and never stir from that place.

Ver. 7. Then he shall minister in the name of the Lord his God.] Attend continually at the altar, to do all the service of the sanctuary. The LXX. translate it, He shall minister to the name of the Lord, i. e. to the Divine Majesty, who dwells there.

As his brethren the Levites do.] As all those do who live at that place.

Which stand there before the Lord.] To minister unto him: this was the case of Samuel.

Ver. 8. They shall have like portion to eat.] This shews that he is speaking of the priests; for the Levites did not eat of the holy things offered at the altar: and the meaning is, that the rest of the priests who waited there, should allow him the same portion which they themselves had in the sacrifices.

Besides that which cometh of the sale of his patrimony.] Which was to remain proper to himself, and not be divided with other priests at Jerusalem (suppose) where he ministered. The Hebrew words are something obscure, being beside his sales by, or unto the fathers, that is, such possessions as their fathers purchased, and left to them: for though the priests had no share in the land of Canaan given them at the division of it, yet they might purchase houses, and goods, and cattle; and sometimes they purchased fields, as we read Abiathar had fields of his own at Anathoth, 1 Kings ii. 26. and the prophet Jeremiah, who was a priest also, purchased a field of his uncle's son in his own town, Jer. xxxii. 7, 8, &c.

But the Jews make a quite different construction of these three verses, which they understand in this manner, that if any Levite (i. e. priest, for they only ministered before God) came up out of the city where he commonly resided, out of pure devotion to attend at the three solemn feasts, which were held at the place where the sanctuary was (where they were bound to wait, only when their course came, but at these feasts might all come and minister in the sanctuary), his brethren, whose week it was then to attend, should both admit him to minister before God with them, and also give him an equal portion with themselves in the extraordinary sacrifices which were then offered at those festivals, except only those which were peculiarly assigned to them whose week of waiting at the altar it then was; who, by the ordinance of God, delivered to Moses and Aaron (who, they suppose, are here called the fathers), were to have the right shoulder of the peace-offerings. See Lev. vii. 33. where it is said, "He among the sons of Aaron that offereth the peace-offerings and the fat, shall have the right shoulder for his part;" in which none other was to participate. But why this should be called the sales, I do not understand, unless we interpret it as Forsterus doth, venditiones, i. e. "res venditas à patribus," things sold by the fathers, that is, appropriated by them (to the particular priest that offered the sacrifice), as things sold are to those that buy them.

Ver. 9. When thou art come into the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.] The land of Canaan, which the Lord was about to bestow upon them, according to his promise.

Thou shalt not learn to do after the abominations of those nations.] Now he returns to warn them again not to fall into the idolatry and the superstitions of the country whither they were going. (See Lev. xviii. 3.)

Ver. 10. There shall not be found among you.] So as to be tolerated.

Any one that maketh his son or his daughter to pass through the fire.] This was the most abominable idolatry practised in that country whither they were going, who consecrated their children in this manner to Moloch, or the sun, of which I have said sufficient, Lev. xviii. 21. Therefore I shall only add here, that this wicked custom seems to have flowed from this country of the Phœnicians and Tyrians unto the Carthaginians; who were guilty of the impiety of sacrificing their children, as they did also here unto Moloch, (Lev. xx. 2, 3.) which spread itself, in a manner, over all the world, as many have shewn; particularly Joh. Geusius, in his treatise de Victimis Humanis, par. i. cap. 11. and it was found among the Americans, when that new world was discovered. (See also par. ii. cap. 5.)

Or that useth divination.] Of which there were many sorts; and one was, by raking into the bowels of their sacrifices, particularly of human sacrifices; by the observation of which they pretended to foretell things, as many authors testify. Yea, they offered little children on purpose, that thereby they might make their auguries, as the same Geusius hath observed in that book, (cap. 21.) Unto which, perhaps, there is a peculiar respect in this place; for I find most of the things here mentioned, joined in other places with making their children pass through the fire, particularly 2 Kings xxi. 6. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 6. And the prophet Ezekiel seems to intimate, that hereby they divined, when he charges the Israelites with this crime, xx. 26. 31. For he adds, Shall I be inquired by you, O house of Israel, who have inquired, that is, by making your children pass through the fire?

But it must be confessed, that the Hebrew words kosem kosemim (which we translate useth divination), are by many thought to have a peculiar respect unto such as used to divine by casting or drawing of lots. And the word, as our learned Dr. Castell observes, is so used in the Arabian language for distribution of lots. Which sort of divination was much in use among the Greeks and Romans; and had been so, it is very likely, in more ancient times among the eastern nations: for nothing is more known than the Sortes Prænestinæ and Pativinæ among the Romans; and the Dodonææ, and Dindymenæ, and many others, among the Greeks, particularly that at Bura in Achaia, where there was a cave in which was the image of Hercules; before which they, who resorted thither to inquire directions in any case, or the success of any affair, used to fall down, and say their prayers, and after that to throw four dice upon the table, and by the letters or marks upon which they fell, the divination was made; as Pausanias describes it in his Achaica. In other places they used them in a different manner, and the ancient Arabians divined by arrows, as our famous Dr. Pocock has shewn in his notes upon Gregor. Abulfaragus's book, concerning the Original and Manners of the Arabians, p. 327, 328, &c. where he describes the manner of it, and shews that it was performed before some idol, and therefore was strictly forbidden, by Mahomet in his Alcoran, as a diabolical invention. In which he seems to have imitated Moses, who may be thought here to forbid such kind of divination; which was in use among the eastern people in the days of the prophet Ezekiel, xxi. 21. where we find the same word kosem, which that learned author thinks is illustrated by that Arabian custom.

It is to be noted, also, that they used to divine by a dead man's skull, as our Dr. Windet hath observed out of the Sanhedrin, (cap. 7.) and Maimonides. Which custom the Greeks likewise followed; for Palladius relates how Macarius inquired πρὸς τὸν ξηρὸν κράνιον, at a dry skull, &c. (See Windet, in his book de Vitæ Functorum Statu, sect. 1.)

Several sorts of such kind of persons there were among the Edomites, Moabites, and other nations near Judea, who, in the days of Jeremiah, deceived the people with their divinations, prophecies, dreams, enchantments, and sorceries, as we learn from Jer. xxvii. 3. 9.

Or an observer of times, or an enchanter.] Of these I have said enough upon Lev. xx. 26.

Or a witch.] This word signifies worse than any of the former, viz. one that doeth mischief unto men or beasts by evil arts: concerning which see upon Exod. xxii. 18. Unto which I shall here add, that the Jewish nation have been extremely addicted to witchcraft, and some of their famous rabbins have been suspected of it. (See J. Wagenseil upon Sota, p. 529.)

Ver. 11. Or a charmer.] There are various conjectures about the meaning of the Hebrew words chober chaber; which importing something of society, or conjunction, some translate fortune-teller, who by the conjunction of the planets pretends to predict future things; others, one that hath society with evil spirits, which is mentioned afterward in another word. Job Ludolphus seems to me to have given the plainest account of the words, which he translates congregans congregationem, gathering together a company. For it was an ancient way of enchantment, to bring various kinds of beasts into one place, which the rabbins distinguish into the great congregation, and the little congregation: the great was, when they assembled together a great company of the larger sort of beasts; and the less, when they gathered together as great a company of the smaller, such as serpents, scorpions, and the like: but we cannot be certain of this; though Telezius tells us, it is in use at this day in the eastern countries. For so he describes the election of the king of Gingir, that he stood compassed about with lions, tigers, leopards, and dragons, which, by magical arts, were gathered together as his guard and courtiers. (See Ludolphi Comment. in Hist. Ethiop. cap. 16. n. 116.)

But the common interpretation which the Jews give of chober chaber is, that he is one who uses strange words, which have no signification; but he pretends are powerful to charm a serpent (for instance), that it shall not sting, or to preserve from any other harm. So Maimonides, in Avoda Zara, cap. 11. And to this sort of superstition the world was so addicted, that this precept of Moses could not bring the Jews quite off from it; but, when they threw away other charms, they used the words of Scripture instead of them; pretending, for instance, to cure wounds by reading that verse in the law, Exod. xv. 26. "I will put none of these diseases upon thee," &c. So we find they themselves acknowledge in Sanhedrin, cap. 2. sect. 1. And Maimonides saith, in the forenamed treatise, this is forbidden by Moses in this place, as much as any other kind of charm; "for the words of the law are turned hereby to another use than God intended in them; which was not for healing the body, but curing the soul." And I see no reason why it should not be thought as great a crime to use the Schem Hamphorash (as they call the name Jehovah) to such purposes; and yet the Jews are so stupid as to imagine Moses wrought all his miracles by the virtue of it. Maimonides, indeed, was so sober as to reject this common conceit, condemning those who think there was a power in the very letters and pronunciation of the word, (lib. i. More Nevochim, cap. 62.)

Or a consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard.] Of these two see what I have noted, Lev. xix. 31. and Lev. xx. 6.

A necromancer.] In the Hebrew, one that seeks to, or inquires of, the dead. It is not easy to tell wherein this differs from one that had a familiar spirit, as we translate it. For the woman whom Saul consulted, who had a spirit, called Oboth, inquired also after this manner; their spirit, it seems, teaching such persons to call for the dead to appear to them: but some, perhaps, had not such a spirit, who notwithstanding consulted the dead, by going to their graves in the night, and there lying down, and muttering certain words with a low voice, that they might have communion with them by dreams, or by their appearing to them: unto which the prophet Isaiah is thought to allude, viii. 19. xxix. 4. Maimonides, in Avoda Zara, cap. 11. sect. 15. thus describes a necromancer; He is one, who, having afflicted himself with fasting, goes to the burying-place, and there lies down, and falls asleep; and then the dead appear to him, and tell him what he desires. Such are they also, who put on a certain kind of garment, speak some uncouth words, and make a fume, and then lie down alone, that the dead, whom they desire, may come to them, and discourse with them in their sleep. To the same purpose Aben Ezra. To this the gentiles were very prone; and it was thought so high an attainment to come to this knowledge, that Julian the apostate, who was ambitious to be acquainted with all the heathen mysteries, secretly practised this Νεκυομαντεία, in the most retired part of his palace, cutting up the bodies of virgins and boys, to bring up the dead to him; which was far more impious than what the Talmudists say (in the title Beracoth), that such kind of people were wont to burn the secundine of a black cat, when she had her first kittens, and, beating it very small, put some of the powder upon their eye, whereupon demons appeared to them. (See Greg. Nazianz. in his invectives against Julian, p. 91. and St. Chrysostom, in his oration upon St. Babylas.) I shall only add, that this was not only privately practised among the gentiles, but there were also public places to which men resorted to consult the dead, particularly at Thesprotis, near to the river Acheron, where Herodotus, lib. v. mentions a Νεκυομαντήϊον; and Plutarch (to name no more) mentions another at Heraclea, which Pausanias, in his distress, went to consult, as he relates in the life of Cimon.

Ver. 12. For all that do these things are an abomination to the Lord.] Because they were invented by idolatrous people, if not by the suggestions of evil spirits.

And because of these abominations the Lord thy God doth drive them out from before thee.] Expelled the Amorites, and other wicked inhabitants of the country, where they practised these abominations; which, no doubt, had some relation to idolatry, and therefore were forbidden to the Israelites.

Ver. 13. Thou shalt be perfect with the Lord thy God.] This shews there was something of idolatrous worship in all the forenamed practices; which, if they followed, it was, in some degree, to forsake the Lord, on whom they were wholly to depend, and seek to him alone in the ways which he had prescribed in his laws. For this was to be perfect with the Lord; to have nothing to do with any other God, nor with the rites and ceremonies that were used in their worship: and therefore the LXX. translate this word sometimes by ἁπλόω, (Job xxii. 3.) as well as by τελειόω; for then they were perfect with God, when they kept his worship simple and pure, without the mixture of any foreign religion; which the whole context shews to be the sense, both in the words foregoing and following.

Ver. 14. For those nations, which thou shalt possess, hearkened unto observers of times, and to diviners.] The ancient heathen, as Strabo tells us, lib. vi. had these diviners in such esteem, ὥστε καὶ βασιλείας οὐ ἀξιοῦσθαι, that they thought them worthy of the highest authority. But God would not have his people so much as to consult such persons: for it appears by these words, that not only they who were diviners (for instance), but they who hearkened to them, were odious to God. For that even the art of divination depended upon some idolatrous opinions and practices, appears evidently, even from the most refined account we have of it in ancient authors: for instance, Ammianus Marcellinus, who, to acquit his master Julian from the suspicion of sorcery, which some said he used, to get the foreknowledge of things future, makes it a principal point of wisdom, not unworthy such a prince, who was a professed lover of all sciences, to offer placatory sacrifices to draw in the spirit of all the elements, to endue him with a spirit of divination: for so his words are in the beginning of his one-and-twentieth book: "The spirit of all the elements, being all way and every way invigorated with the foreperceiving motion of the everlasting (i. e. the heavenly) bodies, makes us partakers of the gifts of divining; and the substantial powers, ritu diverso placatæ, being rendered favourable by respective rites (i. e. such as were proper and suitable to each of them), convey predictions to mortality, as from so many perpetual springs or fountains, over which (substantial powers) the goddess Themis is said to preside," &c. Which shews that Julian, who called Jupiter the most high God, the King of all, yet courted other inferior powers, by such rites as he imagined would win their favour: which was rank idolatry.

But as for thee, the Lord thy God hath not suffered thee so to do.] But absolutely forbidden it, Lev. xix. 31. xx. 6. where he warns them to have nothing to do with some of the persons here mentioned; and not only instructed them in the way to live happy, but established an oracle among them, to be consulted on all weighty occasions, and governed them by men, whom he had endued with his Spirit, (Numb. xi. 16, 17. 25.) Therefore, if any Israelite practised any of the things here forbidden, though he did not worship any idol, he was scourged by the sentence of the court of judgment. (See Selden, lib. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 7.)

Ver. 15. The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet.] Since the Jews, as all other nations, were extremely desirous to know things to come, Moses reveals unto them from God a thing future of the highest importance, viz. the coming of Christ, and the greatness of his authority; and in aftertimes God revealed to them, by degrees, the time of his birth, his death, resurrection, &c. The Jews, indeed, commonly take these words to be a promise of a constant succession of prophets, that should be among them, to preserve them from going to such diviners as were famous among their heathen neighbours; and thus many Christian interpreters make out the connexion of these words with the foregoing. But though this may be allowed to be intimated, and this promise be acknowledged to be partly verified in those prophets which God raised up, from age to age, after Moses, for further knowledge of his will (as the promise of a Saviour was in part verified in those judges and kings by whom God delivered his people from their enemies), yet it is very evident, that he speaks of a single prophet more eminent than all the rest; and that these words, in their most literal sense, cannot belong to any other person but the Messiah. So that albeit the continuance of prophets among this people, was a means to prevent all occasions of consulting sorcerers or witches; yet the chief ground upon which Moses dissuades them from such practices, according to the literal connexion of these words with the foregoing, the Lord thy God hath not suffered thee to do so, i. e. to hearken unto observers of times and diviners, was, the consideration of their late mighty deliverance by Moses; the excellency of their present law, which God had given them for their direction; and their expectation of a greater Lawgiver in future times, when the first covenant should wax old, and prophecy itself for a long time fail, as it did before the coming of this great prophet, the Lord Christ. To this purpose Dr. Jackson, in his third book upon the Creed, chap. 21. parag. 19.

From the midst of thee, of thy brethren.] It was a great honour to them to have such a prophet as is here spoken of, arise out of their nation; but as he was after a peculiar sort raised up by Jehovah, not merely by the external assistances or impulsion of his Spirit, (to use the words of the same excellent person, parag. 9.) but by intrinsic assumption into the unity of his person; so likewise he was raised up in a strict and proper sense from the midst of them, being, as it were, extracted out of a pure virgin, as the first woman was out of the man, by the Almighty's own immediate hand.

Like unto me.] This shews he speaks of a single prophet, and not of a constant succession of prophets, there being none of them like to Moses, whom God himself distinguished from them all, (Numb. xii. 6—8.) And accordingly that Divine writer, who added those verses which are at the end of this book (concerning the death of Moses), testifies that there never rose in Israel a prophet like to Moses. (See Deut. xxxiv. 10.) It is commonly thought to be done by Ezra, who hath effectually confuted all the conceits of R. Bechai, Aben Ezra, Abarbinel, and other Jewish doctors, who take either Joshua or Jeremiah to have been this prophet. If Joshua, as some fancy, added these words, then he excluded himself from being the person; nor did Joshua act as a prophet, but as a judge or governor: and Jeremiah is acknowledged by Abarbinel himself to be inferior to Isaiah: for though in his preface to his commentary upon Jeremiah, he mentions fourteen things wherein he was like unto Moses, and saith he prophesied just forty years, as Moses did; yet, in his commentary upon the lesser prophets, he prefers Isaiah before them all, and censures the rudeness of Jeremiah's language, in many things preferring Ezekiel to him. So little do these doctors agree in their interpretation of this prophecy, which can belong to none of their prophets which succeeded Moses (who were all much inferior to him), until He came, who perfectly resembled him, but was much superior to him. (See ver. 18.) And thus the ancient Jews understood this prophecy; for though Maimonides only saith, the Messiah should be endued with wisdom greater than Solomon's, and should equal their master Moses, yet those before him proceeded a great deal further. This being a common saying among them, which Abarbinel himself remembers, in his commentary upon the small prophets, " He shall be exalted above Abraham, lifted up above Moses, and higher than the angels of the ministry." Nor is the cabalistical observation, mentioned in Baal-Hatturim, to be quite neglected; which is, that this verse begins and ends with the letter nun, which is the numeral letter for fifty, importing, that to the prophet here promised should be opened the fifty gates of knowledge, forty-nine of which only were opened to Moses. And that this verse also consists of ten words, to signify, that they were to obey this prophet no less than the ten commandments: which observation, it must be confessed, is weakly grounded, but contains a most illustrious truth, and shews that they believed Moses here speaks of the Messiah.

Unto him shall ye hearken.] As they had engaged themselves to do: it will appear from the following words.

Ver. 16. According to all that thou desiredst of the Lord thy God in Horeb, in the day of the assembly, saying, Let me not hear again the voice of the Lord, &c.] So we read Exod. xx. 19. where they made this request unto Moses, saying, Speak thou with us, and we will hear; but let not God speak with us, lest we die. In which words the whole multitude bound themselves solemnly to hear the words of the Lord, being delivered not immediately from his own mouth, but by Moses, as is more fully expressed in this book, Deut. v. 27—29. where God highly commends this good resolution in them, as Moses here observes again in the next verse.

Ver. 17. And the Lord said unto me, They have well spoken that which they have spoken.] He approved their desire, and resolved not to speak to them any more, as he did from Mount Sinai, with a voice out of the fire and cloud; but by Moses himself while he lived, and afterward by one like to Moses, as it here follows.

Ver. 18. I will raise them up a Prophet from among their brethren.] These words seem to have been spoken to Moses by God, when they desired God would not speak to them any more immediately by himself, but by a mediator. Then God was pleased to promise them a great deal more than they desired, which was to raise up another Prophet like to Moses, who should acquaint them more fully with his mind and will in as familiar a manner as Moses did, without striking any such terror into them, as they were in at the giving of the law, though the words of this prophet came from the mouth of God himself: in which two things the Israelites excelled all other nations (i. e. in that they had such an excellent law delivered by Moses, which was to be bettered by an everlasting covenant, made by this Prince of the prophets). In respect of both (as the same Dr. Jackson expresses it), the name of soothsayer, or sorcerer, was not to be named in Israel, as they were in the nations that knew not God, much less expected such a Mediator. In whom the Spirit of life should dwell as plentifully, as splendour doth in the body of the sun; from whose fulness, ere he visibly appeared in the world, all other prophets were illuminated: so that Moses himself, and all the prophets that followed him, were but as messengers sent from God, to solicit his people to preserve their allegiance free from all commerce or compact with familiar spirits, until the Prince of Glory came in person to visit them, and dwell among them.

Like unto thee.] This is well explained by Eusebius, δεύτερος κατὰ Μωυσέα νομοθέτης, a second lawgiver, as Moses was: for in saying not simply he would raise them up a prophet, but like unto thee, it must signify, saith he, that this Prophet should be a lawgiver as well as Moses, which none of the prophets were, till our Saviour came. Neither Isaiah nor Jeremiah were the makers of laws, but only called upon them to observe the law of Moses; whereas, when the Lord Jesus came, he gave laws to all the world, and those far superior to the laws of Moses, who only said, "Thou shalt not commit adultery;" but our Lord saith, "I say unto you, Ye shall not lust;" and instead of "Thou shalt not kill," he saith, "Be not angry with thy brother," &c. Whence it was that they who heard him were astonished at his doctrine, and said, that he spake not as the scribes, who were expounders of the law, but as one that had authority, that is, power to ordain and enact laws, and not only to explain those that were already written, (lib. i. Demonstr. Evang. cap. 7. and lib. iii. cap. 2. lib. ix. p. 443, &c. see also what Joh. Wagenseil hath said upon these words, in his annot. in Lipman. Carm. Memoriale, p. 548.)

And will put my words in his mouth, and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him.] Reveal the whole mind and will of God, (John xii. 49, 50.) For he was herein like to Moses (though far superior to him), that he was intimately acquainted with God's counsels, being "in the bosom of the Father," (1 John xviii.) and confirmed all that he said to be from God by miracles, and wonders, and signs, far more mighty than those of Moses, and more in number than had been wrought by all the prophets, from the beginning of the world. Particularly, he fed multitudes with a little food, (which made the people cry out, "This is of a truth that Prophet which should come into the world," John vi. 14.) but above all this, gave them that bread from heaven, of which the manna which Moses gave them was but a shadow, as he took occasion to shew the people, upon their admiration of that miraculous feast he had made for them, with five barley-loaves, and two small fishes: for he himself was that bread of life, who nourished men's souls with the word of eternal life, which he had in himself, as he shewed by his resurrection from the dead, which he himself predicted, and thereby proved himself the greatest of all the prophets: for though Moses foretold his own death, yet neither he, nor any other prophet whatsoever but our Saviour, spake of his being raised up again. In which he may be thought to be like to Moses, who was raised up by God to be a saviour of his people out of that ark, which, without the special providence of God, had been his tomb. And unto this resurrection of Christ doth the propriety of this phrase, from the midst of thee, agree: for this was done, as Dr. Jackson also well observes, in the midst of Jerusalem, the metropolis of Judea, not without express notice given of it to the rulers of the people; and such a confirmation it was, that he was the prophet they should all hear, that there could not be a greater; as all strangers, both to their religion and ours, must agree, and they themselves cannot deny: for Nachmanides, relating, in a letter of his to the rabbins at Marseilles, how there was a man in those days, in the southern countries, who pretended to be the forerunner of the Messiah, unto whom great numbers both of Jews and Arabs resorted, tells us, that he being apprehended by the king of the country, and asked what miracle he shewed to confirm his commission, he answered boldly, "Cut off my head, and I will come to life again." To which the king of the Arabs replied, "There is no sign greater than this; which, if it come to pass, both I and the whole world will believe thee." Whereupon his head was cut off, and there was an end of all his pretences; though some of the Jews were so mad, as Maimonides there saith, that they still expected his return to life. Thus R. Gedaliah reports in his Schalshelet Hakkabalah.

Ver. 19. And it shall come to pass, that whosoever will not hearken unto my words, which he shall speak in my name.] This is the proper character of a prophet, to deliver in the name of God what he received from God. This did Moses: but Christ most eminently, as I before observed from John xii. 49, 50. where he saith, I have not spoken of myself, but the Father which sent me; he gave me a commandment what I should say and what I should speak, &c. whatsoever therefore I speak, even as the Father said unto me, so I speak. Which is a perfect commentary upon these words of Moses, who here calls Christ a prophet, not a priest, or a king (though he was to be both), because he would not have the Jews mistake, and expect to find in his person the worldly grandeur of a mighty prince, or the high honour and splendour of Aaron; but have the greatest regard to the heavenly doctrine which he taught them, as he himself (he told them) was taught by the Father: For I proceeded forth (saith he) and came from God; neither came I of myself, but he sent me; and I do nothing of myself, but as my Father hath taught me, I speak these things,

John viii. 28. 42. This was the highest honour of all, to speak God's words, (ver. 47.) in the name of God, (ver. 42.)

I conclude this with the remarkable words of the Midrasch upon Ecclesiastes, who thus expresses the sense of this prophecy, "As was the first Redeemer, such shall be the last Redeemer." Which plainly determine the prophet here spoken of to be one single person; and he no other but the Lord Christ. (See Huetius, in his Demonst. Evang. propos. 7. n. 9.)

I will require it of him.] Severely punish him, so as to destroy him from among his people, as St. Peter interprets it, Acts iii. 23. And so this phrase is used, Gen. ix. 5. xlii. 22. And there was great reason for this severity, seeing they had so solemnly bound themselves to hearken to this prophet, when they desired God not to speak any more to them by himself, but by a mediator, which God then promised, as I observed, ver. 18. A mediator of a better covenant, who should secure them from such dreadful flames, as they then saw, if they would hearken to him, as they promised to do; otherwise, what could they expect, "but a certain fearful looking-for of judgment, and fiery indignation, to devour the adversaries?" For since "he that despised Moses's law died without mercy, under two or three witnesses, of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God," in the open face of all the world? Heb. x. 27—29. which is a full explication of these words, Whosoever will not hearken unto my words, which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him: or, as Onkelos translates it, my Word shall require it of him: where Memra, Word, can signify nothing but a Divine person, distinct from him who speaks these words, even that very person to whom the apostle applies them.

Ver. 20. But the prophet which shall presume to speak a word in my name, &c.] These words plainly suggest to us, that Moses intended, in the foregoing discourse, to admonish the Israelites to hearken diligently to all such prophets as God should at any time raise up to them; though it be most evident, if we examine the propriety of every word or clause in the whole context, they cannot be exactly fitted unto any prophet but Christ; unto whom the whole discourse is as fully accommodated, as a well-made garment to the body that wears it. They are the words of the same excellent person, so often mentioned, Dr. Jackson, book iii. on the Creed, chap. 21. parag. 1, 2.

Speak a word in my name, which I have not commanded him, or that shall speak in the name of other gods.] It was a manifest sign a man was a false prophet, if he spake in the name of Baal, or any other god, but the God of Israel: or if he said, Such a star by its spiritual influence coming upon me, said, Worship me after this manner, or, Thus call upon me, as Maimonides (who gives an account of the several sorts of false prophets) speaks, in his preface to Seder Zeraim. But how should they know a man to be a false prophet, when he spake to them in the name of the Lord? For men might pretend, as some did, that God had sent them, and given them a command, when he had not. To which he answers in the next verses.

Even that prophet shall die.] He was to be strangled, say the Jews, by the sentence of the great Sanhedrin: for it is a tradition of their rabbins, saith the Gemara Babylonica upon that title, that in the business of prophecy there are three sorts of persons, who are to be punished by the judgment of men, and three by the sentence of Heaven. He that prophesied what he did not hear from God, (an example of which we have in Zedekiah, 1 Kings xxii. 11.) or spake what was not said to him, but to another, (an example of which they make Hananiah, Jer. xxviii. 11.) or prophesies in the name of an idol (suppose Baal); all these were to be put to death by the sentence of the court of judgment; but he that suppressed his prophecy (like Jonah), or despised the words of a prophet, or did not observe his own words, was to be punished by the hand of Heaven. (See Selden, lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 6. n. 1.)

Ver. 21. And if thou say in thine heart, How shall we know the word which the Lord hath not spoken?] Which was but a reasonable question, there being as great care necessary, not to hearken to falsehood, as to be attentive unto truth. And this relates unto such prophets as came to them in the name of the Lord: for if a man came in the name of any other God, there needed no other mark to discover him to be an impostor.

Ver. 22. When a prophet speaks in the name of the Lord.] Predicting some wonderful thing to come to pass, as a token he is sent of God to deliver what he speaks to the people.

If the thing follow not, nor come to pass, that is the thing which the Lord hath not spoken.] For if the Lord had sent him, he would have accomplished what he gave as a sign of his mission; which not coming to pass, he was proved to be a false prophet, who spake out of his own heart, and not the word of the Lord. But here the Jews distinguished between a prophet who predicts evil things, as famine, or pestilence, &c. and one that predicts good things, as rain (when there is great need of it), and fruitful years, &c. Though the predictions of the former sort did not come to pass, he was not to be reputed presently a false prophet, because God is very merciful, and often repented him of the evil, as he did in the case of Nineveh: but, in the latter case, if any one of the good things he foretold did not come to pass, he was to be taken for a deceiver; which they understand also of the very time and place, when and where he said the things he predicted would be fulfilled: and here they bring in the example of Hananiah, the son of Azur, mentioned before, Jer. xxviii. 11. and see ver. 8, 9. of that chapter. But this doth not give us the true difference; for both God's promises and threatenings many times depend upon a condition, as appears from that famous place in the prophet, Jer. xviii. 7—9. So that the good things a prophet foretold might not come to pass, and yet he might be a true prophet; because the people proved unworthy of them, and God did not absolutely intend them. Therefore the true meaning seems to be, that if a prophet foretold such a thing as the power of nature cannot produce, and gave it as a sign God sent him, who would justify his mission by doing that wonder, and the thing did not come to pass, he was to be looked upon as not a man of God: for example, when Moses threw his rod on the ground, and said it should become a serpent, if it had not been turned into a serpent, he had been convicted of falsity: or a prophet said fire should come down from heaven, and consume the sacrifice which lay before him, which was the case of Elijah; if it had not come down, he would have been no more owned for a true prophet, than the prophets of Baal. And, as Maimonides well observes, if a prophet's words were fulfilled in one or more things, he was not to be judged a true prophet, unless every thing he spake in the name of God came to pass: which he proves from those words concerning Samuel, (1 Sam. iii. 19, 20.) "The Lord let none of his words fall to the ground: and all Israel knew that Samuel was established to be a prophet of the Lord."

The Jews also made this addition to the rule forementioned of trying prophets, as Mr. Selden observes, (lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 5. n. 3.) that "whatsoever prophet had the testimony of another undoubted prophet, was to be taken for a true prophet." By which rule they might have known the great Prophet whom God promised to them in the foregoing verses: for John the Baptist, whom the whole nation took for a prophet, testified to them that Jesus was the Christ. And besides all other undoubted marks of his being sent from God, his rising from the dead, which he himself foretold, was enough to satisfy all men of the truth of what he said: for though every prediction of what afterward comes to pass, will not necessarily prove a man to be a true prophet; yet the fulfilling of a great number of things (not one of which fails, as was said before of Samuel), especially of such a thing as this, which was impossible to be brought to pass but by an almighty power, is an uncontrollable evidence of a Divine mission.

R. Solomon, upon this verse, hath a note which is worth our observation, though it be not to the purpose of Moses's words: "A prophet (saith he) that bids thee not observe some of the precepts, is not to be heard, unless he be known to be a man of eminent virtue, and upright life, as Elijah was, who bade them build an altar on Mount Carmel, even when the sacrifices upon high places were forbidden. But there was a necessity for it, that he might restore the true worship of God in Israel." Which should have made them hearken to our blessed Saviour, better than they did, he being so perfectly holy and pure, that he challenged any of them to charge him with sin; especially, when he only laid aside some of their vain traditions, but conformed to all the rites of Moses: so that if in conclusion we should grant that Moses (in the fourteenth and sixteenth verses, &c.) speaks of all the prophets that should succeed him (which it is certain he doth not principally intend), the Jews were impious in rejecting our Saviour, who came as a prophet to them, and had all the marks that a prophet could have of his being sent from God.

But the prophet hath spoken it presumptuously.] For it was an act of high presumption, and arrogant pride, for any man to pretend a commission from God, when he had not sent him. Which was done two ways, as the Jews interpret this, either when a man spake in the name of God that which was false, or when he pretended that to have been spoken to him which was revealed by God to another. (See Jer. xxii. 30.) Both these were impudent impostors, and accordingly to be treated.

Thou shalt not be afraid of him.] Have no reverence or regard to him, though he be never so confident: nor be afraid to lay hold of him, and endeavour to bring him to the Sanhedrin, to have their sentence passed upon him (as the Jews understand it), though he have never so powerful an interest to support him, and preserve him from punishment. Thus Maimonides, in the forenamed preface to Seder Zeraim: "Thou shalt not be terrified, or averted from endeavouring to have him put to death, by his religion, goodness, or knowledge, since in his proud brags he hath spoken false things of God." For to be afraid of such a person, and of his partakers, was to distrust God, who is the defender of those that defend the cause of religion.

CHAP. XIX.

HAVING sufficiently pressed upon the people the great commandment, of loving God with all the heart, and soul, and strength, and him alone, Moses now proceeds to remember them of other precepts belonging to the second table (as we now speak), but not in an exact method, nor without interspersing some ceremonial matters. And he begins with what concerns that commandment, Thou shalt not kill.

Ver. 1. WHEN the Lord thy God hath cut off the nations, whose land the Lord thy God giveth thee, &c.] The very same words we had before upon another occasion, xii. 29. which are now used to signify, that they were not bound to what follows, till God had subdued the land of Canaan for them, and they were settled in it; as the last words of the verse import, dwellest in their cities, and in their houses. Accordingly, after the division of the land, God puts Joshua in mind of this business, (Josh. xx. 1, 2, &c.)

Ver. 2. Thou shalt separate three cities from thee.] According to an order God had given to Moses, Numb. xxxv. 14, 15. to set aside six cities in all, for the use here mentioned; three on this side Jordan, where they now were, and three on the other side in the land of Canaan. The former part of which command Moses himself had executed, (Deut. iv. 42, &c.) and now gives them a charge to perform the other.

In the midst of thy land, which the Lord thy God giveth thee to possess it.] In the midst of their land, signifies no more but within their land: for if they had been all three in the very heart of the country, it would have crossed the end and intention of them, which was, that they should be placed so conveniently in several parts of the country, that men might easily and speedily flee to them. And therefore the midst of the land may be opposed to the skirts of the country, where they would have been too far distant from some parts of it; or may denote, that they should be set in an eminent place, upon the top of mountains, where they might be seen afar off. And so they all three were, it is apparent from Josh. xx. 7. where they are said to be in Mount Naphtali, Mount Ephraim, and the mountain of Judah.

Ver. 3. And thou shalt prepare thee a way.] Make a plain road to them, and keep it in good repair, that, both in winter and summer, the manslayer might without difficulty flee thither. And for his more safe passage, the Hebrews say, where there were any turnings, or two ways parted, they were bound to set up a post, or stone, whereon was engraven, in great letters, the word MIKLAT, i. e. refuge, that he might not mistake his way to the place.

And divide the coast of thy land (which the Lord thy God giveth thee to inherit), into three parts.] The Jews understand it, that they were to be placed at an equal distance, in three several parts of the country, that all might have the same benefit by them; and nobody have a longer journey to go than his neighbour for his safety.

That every slayer may flee thither.] Have the convenience of preserving himself in one or other of them. It is observable, that there were as many of these cities in the two tribes and a half, as there were in all the other nine tribes and a half; in which there seems to be a great inequality. I have given some account of it upon Numb. xxxv. 14. And the Hebrews fancy there was another reason for it, because of the frequent murders which were likely to be committed by the fierce nature of the Gileadites. (See the book of Judges, chap. x. and xi. and Hosea vi. 8.)

Ver. 4. And this is the case of the slayer which shall flee thither, that he may live.] Be preserved from the avenger of blood, who otherwise might kill him.

Whoso killeth his neighbour ignorantly, whom he hated not in time past.] These cities were not to be a protection to a wilful murderer, but to an innocent person, who, against his intention, was so unhappy as to kill a man, belidaath (as the words are in the Hebrew), without his knowledge, being free, that is, from any design to do him the least harm. But as for such as, out of hatred and malice in their hearts, killed another, they were so far from finding safety in these cities, that they were to be pulled from the altar, if they fled thither for sanctuary, as we now speak, (Exod. xxi. 12. 14.) Or, if they would not stir from thence, they might be killed there, as appears by the case of Joab, 1 Kings ii. 28. 30, 31.

Ver. 5. As when a man goeth into the wood with his neighbour to hew wood, and his hand fetcheth a stroke with the axe to cut down the tree, and the head slippeth from the helve, and lighteth upon his neighbour, that he die.] By this all other like cases were to be judged: that is, when a man was about a lawful business, if any thing happened which he intended not, he was not accountable for it. (See Selden, lib. iv. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 2.)

He shall flee unto one of those cities, and live.] He might get to which of them he could most conveniently, and there be preserved. The Jews, from this word live, conclude, without any other ground for it, that a master was bound to go along with his scholar who fled thither; because, without the doctrine of the law, men did not live, but were dead.

Ver. 6. Lest the avenger of blood pursue the slayer, while his heart is hot.] With anger, which might boil up to such a degree, as to move him to kill the slayer, before he had examined whether there was a just cause.

It is evident that this verse is to be connected with verse the third (the two next, ver. 4, 5. coming in as a parenthesis, to shew who should be preserved in these cities, and who not), being a reason why the cities of refuge should be placed at an equal distance in the several parts of the country, that the journey might not be too long to any of them, but a man might soon flee thither, before the avenger of blood could lay hold of him.

Because the way is long, and slay him.] If he could not have gotten thither in a short time, he might have been in danger to lose his life, though not worthy of death. For, as the law did not punish him that killed a manslayer, when he found him out of the bounds of the city of refuge, (Numb. xxxv. 27.) so it seems to have indemnified him, if he killed him before he got thither.

Whereas he was not worthy of death, inasmuch as he hated him not in time past.] Which, in his rage, the avenger of blood did not consider; and therefore was guilty before God of shedding innocent blood, though the law did not punish him for it.

Ver. 7. Wherefore I command thee, saying, Thou shalt separate three cities for thee.] To prevent which mischief, God commanded, not merely one, but three cities, and those in several places of the country; where men might find safety, if they made haste to flee to them.

Ver. 8. And if the Lord thy God enlarge thy coast (as he hath sworn unto thy fathers), and give thee all the land which he promised to give unto thy fathers.] As far as unto the river Euphrates, (Gen. xv. 18. Exod. xxiii. 31. Deut. i. 7.)

Ver. 9. If thou shalt keep all these commandments to do them, which I command thee this day, to love the Lord thy God, and to walk ever in his ways.] This seems to have been the condition, upon the performance of which depended the enlargement of their border. Which is more fully expressed, xi. 22—24. And so the covenant made with Abraham (in Gen. xv. 18.) is to be understood, as including in it this condition.

Thou shalt then add three cities more for thee besides these three.] We do not read of any more added to these, though their border was enlarged in David's and Solomon's time; and that as far as Euphrates. But those nations which they subdued, were only made tributaries to the kings of Israel, who did not people and possess those countries; and consequently there was no occasion for such cities there; unless the Israelites had been the inhabitants of those countries, as they were of the land of Canaan, (ver. 1.)

Ver. 10. That innocent blood be not shed in thy land, which the Lord thy God giveth thee.] As there would, if, upon supposition of such an enlargement of their borders, there had been no cities nearer to flee unto than these six; which were sufficient only for the land of Canaan, and the land they possessed on this side Jordan, where they now were.

And so blood be upon thee.] The guilt and punishment of blood, in not taking care of the safety of innocent persons.

Ver. 11. But if any man hate his brother, and lie in wait for him, and rise up against him, and smite him mortally that he die, and fleeth into one of these cities.] When there was a manifest design of killing another, and known hatred, he that committed the murder was to receive no benefit by his fleeing to a city of refuge. And then a man was judged to hate his brother, when for three days together he had never spoken to him, though they had kept one another company; as I observed before out of Mr. Selden, (lib. iv. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 2. p. 473.)

Ver. 12. Then the elders of his city shall send and fetch him thence.] Demand him of the elders of the city to which he fled; that he might be sent to them, and tried by them, whether he was guilty of wilful murder, or ought to have the benefit of their protection, being innocent of that crime. (Numb. xxxv. 12. 24.) It is likely there were probable reasons given why he was suspected to be guilty of murder; and therefore they desired the matter might be examined; otherwise, if the case was known to be like that in ver. 5. they did not make this demand.

And deliver him into the hand of the avenger of blood, that he may die.] That is, if they found him guilty of wilful murder; otherwise, they were to deliver him out of the hand of the avenger of blood, and restore him to the city of refuge, that he might not die, (Numb. xxxv. 25.)

Ver. 13. Thine eye shall not pity him.] Nor take any satisfaction for the life of a murderer, as the law is, Numb. xxxv. 31.

But thou shalt put away the guilt of innocent blood from Israel.] By putting him to death.

That it may go well with thee.] By having no guilt upon them; as they had when they let this crime go unpunished.

Ver. 14. Thou shalt not remove thy neighbour's landmark, which they of old time have set in thine inheritance, &c.] The Jewish doctors think that this hath respect to the holy land (as they call it), and to the terms or bounds which were set by Joshua in the division of the country, which no man might take away; for that made him both guilty of theft, and also of the breach of this precept; and consequently he incurred a double punishment, and was whipped twice as much as another offender. (See Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 3. in the latter end.) This was a law among the Grecks, as appears by Plato, lib. viii. de Legibus, Μὴ κινείτω γῆς ὅρια μηδείς, &c. νομίσας τὰ ἀκίνητα κινεῖν ἀληθῶς τοῦτο εἶναι, &c. Let no man presume to remove the bounds of land; looking upon this, as being truly to remove things immoveable, i. e. to unsettle and overturn all things: Numa Pompilius therefore made this crime capital. Which makes Josephus's explication of these words seem more reasonable than that of the Talmudists, who extend this precept to the grounds of all their neighbour nations who were at peace with them: ὡς πολεμῶν ἐντεῦθεν στάσεων γενομένων, as being the occasion of wars and insurrections, which arise from the covetousness of men, who would thus enlarge their territories, (lib. iv. Archæol. cap. 8.) Which may be thought a reason why Moses joins this to the foregoing precept, about punishing murder; and made this one of the curses they were bound to pronounce, and consent to it, at their entrance into the land of Canaan, (Deut. xxvii. 17.)

Which they of old time have set in thine inheritance which thou shalt inherit, in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee to possess it.] This may seem to determine this precept peculiarly to the preserving the bounds in the land of Canaan; and by those of old time they understand Joshua and the elders, who divided the land, and fixed every one his lot. But it was as necessary to be observed in all other countries, as that which was their proper inheritance. For, as Josephus truly observes, "they that remove the bounds of lands, are not very far from subverting all laws."

Ver. 15. One witness shall not rise up.] They that gave their testimony in any cause always stood up.

Against a man for any iniquity, or for any sin.] A single witness was not to be admitted, as sufficient to convict a man of any offence whatsoever, whether in civil or in criminal matters. For an inquisition into the fact one was enough; but not for the condemnation of him that was accused. Yet in pecuniary matters, one witness was sufficient to bring a man to purge himself by an oath, (xvii. 6.)

At the mouth of two witnesses, or at the mouth of three witnesses, shall the matter be established.] The accusation shall stand, or fall to the ground.

Ver. 16. If a false witness rise up against any man, to testify against him that which is wrong.] In any matter, whether against God, or against man. For though one witness could not condemn another; yet, if it were proved he was a false witness, it was sufficient to condemn himself.

Ver. 17. Then both the men between whom the controversy is.] That is, the accuser and the person accused.

Shall stand before the Lord.] They were to come, in cases obscure, to the supreme court, where the sanctuary was settled. Who sat, it is likely, at the door of the tabernacle in Moses's time, (see xvii. 8. 22.) and so might properly be said to try them before the Lord.

Before the priests and the judges which shall be in those days.] This they all understand of the highest court, which consisted partly of priests, and partly of other great persons, whom he calls judges; under which name, the whole court is comprehended in the next verse. (See xvii. 8. and Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 8. n. 2, 3.)

Ver. 18. And the judges.] The court beforenamed; who are all (whether priests or others) comprehended under the name of judges.

Shall make diligent inquisition.] For it was not easy to prove a man to be a false witness; and therefore the matter was brought before this supreme court.

And, behold, if the witness be a false witness, and hath testified falsely against his brother.] If, upon strict examination, he was found to have given a false evidence against his brother, in a matter which touched his estate, or his body, or his life.

Ver. 19. Then shall ye do unto him as he had thought to have done unto his brother.] That is, saith Maimonides, if he designed to have taken away his brother's life, he was to lose his own; if to have him scourged, he was to be lashed himself; if to lose a sum of money, he was to be fined the very same sum. (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 41.) But though in most cases a false witness was to suffer the very same kind of punishment, which he intended to have brought upon another, if his testimony had not been disproved; yet in some it was not exactly observed. As, if one falsely accused a priest's daughter of playing the whore, he was not to be burnt, as she should have been, but to be strangled as an adulterer. So J. Coch observes upon the title Maccoth. ad cap. 1. where the whole business of false testimonies is handled. But some foolish decisions were made by the rabbins, in opposition to the Sadducees, as he observes in his Annot. 20. in sect. 6.

Among the Athenians there was an action lay not only against the false witness, but against the person who produced him. Upon whom they set a fine; and they were made infamous. And if they were found thrice guilty of this crime, not only they but their posterity were made infamous throughout all generations; as Sam. Petitus observes, out of Andocides, and others, (lib. iv. in Leges Aticas, tit. vii. p. 359.) It is something strange they were not more severe against such offenders, many of their laws being plainly borrowed from Moses. And among the ancient Romans, by the law of the twelve tables, false witnesses were thrown down from the Tarpeian rock, as A. Gellius tells us, (lib. xx. cap. 1.) which was altered indeed, in latter times, for such punishments as the judges thought they merited: but he there tells Phavorinus, that, if the old punishment had continued to their days, they should not have had so many false testimonies given as they then saw.

So shalt thou put the evil away from among you.] This may be understood either of the false witness, or of his crime: the guilt of which was taken away by the just punishment of it.

Ver. 20. And those that remain.] The remainder of Israel, who see him suffer in his kind.

Shall hear and fear.] The end of punishment is to deter others from such wickedness. (See xiii. 11. xvii. 13.)

And shall henceforth commit no more any such evil among you.] Learn to beware by other men's sufferings.

Ver. 21. And thine eye shall not spare.] He speaks to the judges, who were not, out of compassion, to moderate the punishment, but make it equal to the damage he intended to another. Examples he gives of this in the words following.

Life shall go for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot.] Concerning this lex talionis, see Exod. xxi. 23—25. Lev. xxiv. 19, 20. And see Grotius on Matt. v. 38. 40. where he well observes, that the party injured might forbear to require this punishment; but the judge, if it were required, could not deny to inflict it.

CHAP. XX.

Ver. 1. WHEN thou goest out to battle against thine enemies.] Who either invaded them, (as in Judg. xi.) or with whom they had a just quarrel, because of injuries done them, without satisfaction: such as that mentioned 2 Sam. x. 4, &c.

And seest horses.] Which the Israelites wanted, (as I observed upon xvii. 16.) their armies consisting of footmen; who were taken from the plough, or from the sheepfolds.

And chariots.] Which carried a certain number of men in them; and when they were falcati (as they called them) were very formidable. For they made terrible slaughters among the enemy, cutting down men as we do grass, with a scythe or sickle. The Canaanites had great numbers of them, Josh. xi. 4. and Judg. iv. 3.

Be not afraid of them.] The Israelites were trained up to confide in God, and not in horses (which their country, as I said, did not afford, and consequently they had no chariots), nor in multitude of soldiers. And we find remarkable instances of this, particularly in Jehoshaphat, (2 Chron. xx. 6, &c. 17.) who followed the example of David, whose words are most memorable, Psalm xx. 7. "Some trust in chariots, and some in horses, but we will remember the name of the Lord our God." (See also Prov. xxi. 21.)

For the Lord thy God is with thee, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt.] That was such an instance of his power, as made it unreasonable to doubt of good success, when he was present with them; as he always was while they continued faithful worshippers of him.

The translation of Onkelos is here very remarkable; which is, The Lord thy God, his Word is thy help: which plainly denotes another Divine person, the same with Jehovah.

Ver. 2. It shall be when ye come nigh unto the battle.] Are about to give or receive the assault.

That the priest shall approach and speak unto the people.] The Jews say there was a priest appointed for this very purpose, whom they call Maschuach Milchama, anointed of war, he being set apart, as they say, to this office by an unction, and that with the same oil which the king was anointed withal. His office was to blow with the trumpets, to make the following speech unto the army, when they were preparing to join battle; and when they first went out, to exhort all new builders, planters, and married men, to return back; and when they were drawn up in battalia, to exhort all that were faint-hearted to leave the army and go home. (See Numb. xxxi. 6.) A great many of the Jewish doctors thus explain this, particularly Maimonides, who may serve instead of all. See Schickard, Jus Regium, cap. 5. Theor. 18. and Hottinger, in his Histor. Eccles. Seculum xvi. par. ii. p. 689, 690, &c. where he produces an excellent discourse out of R. Levi Barzelonita's Catechism, to shew the office of this πολεμόχριστος, anointed for the war; and the reason why he was appointed to it. For soldiers (saith he) in the time of war, have great need to be heartened and confirmed in their resolution. And because the more honourable any one is, the more willingly men hearken to him; therefore the law required, that he, who was to encourage others, should be a select person himself, and a priest, to whom they would be apt to pay a great reverence.

Ver. 3. And shall say unto them, &c.] Going from one battalion (as we now speak) unto another: or else, ordering the officers (mentioned ver. 5.) to go about and speak every where what he did at the head of the army. And he was to speak in the Hebrew language, and no other, as the Jews say, in Mischna Sota, cap. 8. sect. 1. And they have a conceit, that the Romans learnt both the form of encamping out of Moses's law, and also to make orations to their soldiers before they went to fight, as J. Wagenseil observes out of Shilte Hagibborim: though it is more reasonable to think, that common sense taught those that were leaders of others to encourage them to follow them.

Ye approach this day unto battle against your enemies.] Who often appeared very formidable, by the vast number of their horses and chariots, which the Israelites wanted.

Let not your hearts faint.] So we well translate the Hebrew word, be soft, or tender. Which though it be a quality highly commendable with respect to God, (2 Kings xxii. 19.) yet the contrary became them towards their and his enemies.

Fear not, and do not tremble.] Trembling, or, as the Hebrew word is, making haste, i. e. running away, is the effect of fear.

Neither be ye terrified because of them.] Sometimes a great dread of danger made men run away; and sometimes so dismayed them that they could not stir, much less strike a stroke.

Some of the Jewish doctors fancy, that the four several words here used are opposed to so many actions of their enemies, whereby they hoped to strike a terror into them. Let not your hearts faint, when your enemies brandish their swords, and clash them one against another. Fear not, when you hear the prancing of their horses, and the terrible rattling of their chariots. And do not tremble, when they shout, as if they were sure of victory. Neither be ye terrified, when you hear the trumpet sound an alarm to the battle. So Moses Kotzensis. (See Schickard, cap. 5. Theor. 16. p. 115.) And such a passage Wagenseil observes out of Philostratus, lib. ii. cap. 5. upon the Gemara of Sota, cap. 8. sect. ii. p. 876.

Ver. 4. For the Lord your God is he that goeth with you, to fight for you against your enemies.] Sometimes the ark of God's presence went before them, when they entered into Canaan, (Josh. iii. 3. 10, 11, &c.) and in the midst of them, when they compassed Jericho, (Josh. vi. 9.) So that God was properly then said to go with them, or in the midst of them, as the Vulgar Latin here translates it. And at all other times he was present, by his power, to aid them, especially against the people of Canaan, with whom their battles were said to be the wars of the Lord.

To save you.] To preserve them by the defeat and overthrow of their enemies.

Ver. 5. And the officers shall speak unto the people, saying.] This the Jews, particularly Abarbinel, think was spoken by the priest beforementioned, and then proclaimed by the officers, called schoterim, of whom I have observed enough before, xvi. 18. and other places. They that would see more may consult J. Wagenseil upon that title, in the Mischna called Sota, cap. 8. p. 854. But by whomsoever this was spoken, it seems most likely to have been delivered before they drew nigh to the battle, (see ver. 2.) at the first mustering of the army.

What man is there that hath built a new house, and hath not dedicated it?] i. e. Hath not yet dwelt in it. For at their first entrance to dwell in a house, they made a feast, which being the first meal they made there, was called chanach, or dedication; as the same Wagenseil observes out of Michlol Jophi. (See in cap. 8. Sota, sect. 2. annot. 3.) And because a year is allowed to a man to enjoy his wife, before he be obliged to go to the wars, (xxiv. 5.) they allow the same time in these other cases, for the enjoyment of a new house, or of a vineyard; as many have observed, particularly Selden, (lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 13. n. 1. and Schickard, in his Jus Regium, cap. 5. Theor. 16, 17.) And they understand this, not only of a new-built house, but of a house newly come into a man's possession, either by succession, purchase, or gift; yet not of such houses as were not fit for habitation, as Mr. Selden reports their opinion, (lib. iii. de Uxor. Hebr. cap. 3.) In which he seems to have forgot himself; for the Mischna in Sota, cap. 8. sect. 2. saith expressly, this is to be understood of him that built a house, wherein to lay straw, to make a stable, a barn, or a granary; because, as Wagenseil there notes, such places might, in case of necessity, be turned into a dwelling-house.

Let him return to his house, lest he die in the battle, and another man dedicate it.] This was allowed in those wars only which they made voluntarily, but not of those which were ex præcepto, by the Divine commandment, against the seven nations of Canaan and Amalek, in which every man was bound to engage. And so are the other cases, which here follow, to be understood, as all the Jewish writers agree.

Another man dedicate it.] First enjoy it; for this word here does not denote any consecration (as in other places), but beginning to use a thing; which in our English language (as Mr. Selden observes in the place forenamed) we call taking handsel of it; and so the Spanish Jews express it in their translation.

Ver. 6. And what man is he that hath planted a vineyard, and hath not yet eaten of it?] Which he could not lawfully do for the three first years after it was planted. (See Lev. xix. 29, &c.) And in the fourth year, the fruit of it was to be carried to Jerusalem, and eaten there; after which, the fruit of the fifth year was wholly his own, when it was no longer sacred (as the Hebrew word chillel signifies), but common for every body's use. Aben Ezra takes the word in the sense of rejoicing; as if he had said, "Who hath planted a vineyard, and hath not danced in it;" for that was the custom (he saith) when they first enjoyed the fruits of their vineyards. And to this the LXX. seem to have had respect, when they translated it, οὐκ εὐφράνθη ἐξ αὐτοῦ, he hath not been made merry by it. But the other notion is more proper; and the Jews understand it, not only of vineyards, but of all other plantations wherein there were fruit-trees fit for food, if there were five of them planted together in good order, such as R. Solomon and Wagenseil have described: and see Selden, Uxor. Hebr. lib. iii. cap. 3. p. 334.

Let him also go, and return to his house, lest he die in the battle, and another man eat of it.] The ground, both of this and the foregoing proclamation (and of the next also), seems to have been, that the minds of such men were commonly very much disturbed, to think of leaving what they had taken a great deal of pains about, and enjoy nothing of it; which would naturally make them fight with less courage. So R. Solomon. And Josephus much to the same purpose: μὴ πόθῳ τούτων φειδόμενοι τοῦ ζῆν, &c. lest, out of a longing desire after these things, they should be sparing of hazarding their lives; and, reserving themselves for their enjoyment, not fight manfully. But many think this was a bare concession to such persons; who, if they could overcome their affection to all things, but the safety of their country, might remain in the camp, and go to battle. Yet Abarbinel disputes strongly against this, and will have all these to be precepts, enjoining such persons, as are here mentioned, not to stay in the army, but to return home.

Ver. 7. And what man is there that hath betrothed a wife, and hath not taken her, &c.] The Jews interpret this law, either of one who had espoused a wife, and not yet brought her home; or of one that had but newly completed his marriage. And whether he had married a widow or a virgin, an old woman or a young, it was the same thing. Yea, they extend it to him who had married his brother's wife; but not to him who had married a person prohibited to him by the law, or him that took his own wife again, whom he had formerly put away, because she was not a new wife, as the phrase is, Deut. xxiv. 5. where the time being limited, how long such a man should be free from the war, viz. for one year, they extend it, as I said, to the other two cases; that so long men might enjoy a new house, or a vineyard, after the first use of them, as the law allowed them to enjoy a wife before they went to war. (See Selden, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 3. and Schickard, in his Jus Regium, cap. 5. Theor. 17.) And it must be confessed, that this is a law of great equity, founded in nature, that conjugal love should not be disturbed; but have some time to knit into a strong and stable affection, by an uninterrupted conversation together in its beginning. The Jews were so favourable in this matter, that they say, if five brethren were in the war together, and one of them was slain, leaving a widow without issue, all the remaining four returned home; because every one of them, in their order, in case those before him refused, was to raise up seed to his dead brother.

Ver. 8. And the officers shall speak further unto the people, and they shall say.] Make this new proclamation throughout the camp.

What man is there that is fearful and faint-hearted?] This some of the Jews understand of a natural timorousness, which makes men quake at every danger; and others refer it to those that were old, in whom that heat and vigour, which make men valiant, were quite abated. Upon which account they would not admit one who had no children to go to war (if we may believe Maimonides), because he was not thought masculine enough; or rather, because they would not cut off all hope of his having posterity. But there are those who understand this of the terrors of an evil conscience. (See Sota, cap. 8. sect. 5.) For they did not do as we are wont in these days (who send the wickedest villains into the wars); but if they knew any man to be guilty of a great crime, thrust him out of the army, lest they should all fare the worse for having him among them. (See Schickard, in his Jus Regium, cap. 5. Theor. 17. p. 124.)

Let him go and return to his house, lest his brethren's heart faint as well as his heart.] For the cowardice of some might enfeeble the rest. Yet all these who were thus dismissed, were bound (if required) to furnish the army with victuals and water, to clear the ways, and to take up their quarters; as it is in the foregoing place in Sota, cap. 8. where Joh. Wagenseil observes, that they, who restrain these offices only to the fearful, are mistaken.

Ver. 9. And it shall be when the officers have made an end of speaking to the people, that they all make captains of the armies to lead the people.] This shews that what I noted, ver. 5. is true; that the foregoing proclamation was made before they marched forth to the war: for how should they march till there were captains chosen, to lead the several armies (as those companies, into which they were divided, are called), which was not done till he had spoken all the forenamed things. And if we translate the words as they may be out of the Hebrew [they shall place or set captains of the hosts in the head, or the front, of the people], still it must be supposed, that this was done before they stirred a foot; for no order could be observed without leaders.

Ver. 10. When thou comest nigh unto a city to fight against it, then proclaim peace unto it.] I have often noted, that there were two sorts of war which the Jews undertook: one by the Divine commandment against the seven nations of Canaan; another voluntarily, when they themselves found just cause to make war upon any other neighbouring nation. Now this precept many of the Jews will needs understand only concerning the latter sort of war; for the Canaanites were to be utterly destroyed, without mercy. But Maimonides and Moses Kotzensis take it to belong to both sorts of war. So the former of them in express words: "It was not lawful to make war upon any one whatsoever, before they offered them terms of peace," &c. Only they think the Ammonites and Moabites were to be excepted by that law: (xxiii. 6.) yet they temper it thus; that if those nations desired peace of themselves, it was to be granted to them, though not offered. And the most ancient writers of the Jews say, that Joshua sent three messages to the seven nations of Canaan before he invaded them, though he undertook the war with a command from God to destroy them; viz. if they did not submit to the summons which was sent them, either to flee, or to make peace; which was the subject of the two first messages. The next was a denunciation of war against them, as they say in the Jerusalem Talmud, quoted by Mr. Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 13. and see the learned J. Wagenseil, in annot. upon Sota, p. 845. Maimonides was of opinion, that the Gibeonites had not heard of these proclamations, which made them use craft to procure mercy from the Israelites. But P. Cunæus thinks it more probable, that they had refused, at first, to submit to Joshua's summons; but seeing him victorious, they betook themselves to that artifice, mentioned in the book of Joshua, when they could not hope for peace by any other means, (lib. ii. de Republ. Hebr. cap. 20.)

Ver. 11. And it shall be, if it make thee an answer of peace, and open unto thee.] Accept of the conditions offered to them, which were three. First, that they should take upon them the observation of the several precepts of the sons of Noah, and consequently renounce idolatry. Secondly, pay them a yearly tribute: and, thirdly, become their subjects. (See Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gentium, cap. 4. and Schickard, in his Jus Regium, cap. 5. Theor. 16.)

Then it shall be, that all the people that is found therein shall be tributaries unto thee, and they shall serve thee.] Here are two of the conditions beforementioned; and the first was necessarily supposed, because the Israelites were not to suffer any of their gods to remain among them. For though by serving the Israelites is not meant being made their slaves, yet it imports that they were to live in due subjection to them as their governors, who might employ them in their public works, as repairing the king's palace, the walls of cities, &c.

Ver. 12. And if it will make no peace with thee, but will make war against thee; then thou shalt besiege it.] Without any further summons to yield upon conditions of peace.

Ver. 13. And when the Lord thy God shall deliver it into thy hand.] Of which they were not to doubt, ver. 4.

Thou shalt smite every male thereof with the edge of the sword.] Which was a just punishment for their obstinacy; of which the men, who were here condemned to destruction, were the authors, and suffered the more justly, because they were told, no doubt, beforehand, that if they did not yield when conditions were offered to them, they must expect this execution.

Ver. 14. But the women and the little ones.] Who had not offended, by rejecting conditions of peace, nor could do any harm. And by little ones are to be understood male children, as well as female.

And the cattle, and all that is in the city, even all the spoil thereof.] Money, household-stuff, and all manner of goods.

Shalt thou take unto thyself, &c.] This was granted to them as a reward of their service in the war.

Ver. 15. Thus shalt thou do unto all the cities which are very far off from thee, which are not of the cities of these nations.] This clemency to the women and little ones, is limited to those that were not inhabitants of the land of Canaan; who, in the following verses, are ordered to be otherwise treated. For by the laws of war among all nations, the conqueror might use those whom he subdued as he pleased. See Grotius, lib. iii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 4. sect. 5. where, among other things, he quotes that saying of Marcellus in Livy, "Quicquid in hostibus feci, jus belli defendit," Whatsoever I have done with enemies, the right of war defends it.

Ver. 16. But of the cities of these people, which the Lord thy God doth give thee for an inheritance.] The cities of the land of Canaan.

Thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth.] i. e. Neither man, woman, nor child, as we speak. But their cattle (except in few cases, when they were appointed to be a cherem, i. e. accursed) were not to be killed, as appears from Josh. xi. 14. And the slaughter of all the people, is to be understood only in case they did not surrender when they were summoned, but rejected the conditions of peace that were offered to them. After this, no mercy was to be had upon them. (See Exod. xxiii. 32.) In which their condition was worse than any other people's, whose men were only to be slain, (ver. 14.) but not women and children. For which difference there was a great reason, as I shall shew presently; but if we could see none, we ought to consider that it was done by God's command; who, as he is most just and merciful, so hath a greater right over men, than we have over beasts, as Grotius well observes; who alleges many examples of the like practice in the heathen world, both among Greeks and Romans. (See lib. iii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 4. sect. 9.)

Ver. 17. But thou shalt utterly destroy them.] After they had slighted all offers of peace. Some of the Jews, indeed, have been so merciful as to think this not a command, but a permission; which warranted them to kill all, without any distinction of sex or age; yet did not so enjoin it, but that they might, after they had taken a city, spare such as repented, and offered to become proselytes of the gate. This was the opinion, one would think, which anciently prevailed, as Selden observes, (lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 16.) because we find the relics of these people often mentioned in the Bible. And this is agreeable also to the law of nations, that such as beg mercy should be spared; which flowed from the ancient right which such persons were thought to have to it, as David Chytræus observes out of Thucydides, lib. iii. and the known verse of the oracle, Μήθ' ἱκέτας ἀδικεῖν, ἱκέται ἱεροί τε καὶ ἁγνοί.

Not to hurt supplicants, who are sacred, and acquitted of their offences. He doth not mention the place where this oracle was uttered; but Ezekiel Spanhemius hath lately observed out of Pausanias, that it was at Dodone. See Observationes in Callimachi Hymnum in Dianam, ver. 123. where he notes, that from hence Jupiter was called Ἱκέσιος, because he was accounted a severe and implacable avenger of all violence done to supplicants. And they are supplicants (says the same Chytræus) who confess their sin, and, acknowledging they deserve punishment, give themselves up to the pleasure of the conqueror; but beg the punishment may be mitigated by mercy and clemency.

Namely the Hittites and the Amorites, the Canaanites and the Perizzites, the Hivites and the Jebusites, as the Lord thy God hath commanded thee.] He distinctly mentions the nations which were to be utterly destroyed, that this severity might be extended no further. And so he had done before, vii. 1. where he mentions seven nations, though here are only six, the Girgashites being omitted. The reason of which Maimonides (in Hilcoth Melachim) thinks to be, that they upon the first summons of Joshua fled the country into Africa; and therefore are not named in Josh. ix. 1, 2. among those that "gathered themselves together to fight against Israel." But I take the true reason of this to be, that the Girgashites were a people mixed among the rest; and did not live in a separate part of the country by themselves: but that they opposed Joshua, as well as others, and were delivered into his hand, appears from Josh. xxiv. 11. Now this looks like a great cruelty, to kill so many nations; till we consider who these people were, that God commanded to be utterly extirpated, viz. most abominable idolaters, who offered their children to Moloch, as a piece of pious worship; magicians, witches, necromancers; and guilty of all those filthy lusts mentioned in Lev. xviii. For which crimes God thought them not fit to live any longer upon the face of the earth; and therefore commanded them to be utterly destroyed in this war, which was undertaken by his order, and called therefore the war of the Lord. And so was that against Sihon and Og, who were likewise Amorites, and upon that score rooted out by God's order, Numb. xxi. ult. Deut. ii. 34. For it was mercy to others not to suffer such a wicked generation to live.

Ver. 18. That they teach you not to do after all their abominations, which they have done unto their gods.] Here is the great reason given of the forenamed severe execution, that if they had been spared, they would have infected the Israelites with their filthy idolatry. Which some make an argument, why peace was not to be proclaimed to these nations, (ver. 10.) because they were so wicked, that on no terms it was fit to suffer them to live. But they that object this against what was before said, forget, or do not consider, that the great condition of peace with them was, that they should renounce their idolatry; and then there was no such danger in sparing them. And this was so settled in the opinion of the ancient Jews, that, after they had taken a city, they thought, upon these terms, there was room for mercy. So the book Siphri, upon these very words, lest they teach you to do after all their abominations. From whence it is to be observed (saith that author), "if they repented, the Israelites might let them live." And so R. Solomon himself; "It is to be understood, that if they repented, and became proselytes, it was lawful to receive them."

So should you sin against the Lord your God.] Both by suffering them to live, and imitating them in their wickedness.

Ver. 19. When thou shalt besiege a city a long time, in making war against it, to take it, thou shalt not destroy the trees thereof, by forcing an axe against them, for thou mayest eat of them, and thou shalt not cut them down.] It is very plain that he speaks of fruit-trees, such as bear apples, olives, dates, &c. which were to be preserved both in war and in peace: except in a few cases. In war, if the enemy made advantage of them, for their archers to lurk and shelter themselves behind them, by which the Israelites were much annoyed, then they think they might be cut down, to shorten the siege. And in peace, if they did not bring forth fruit, or if the fruit would not be so profitable as the wood would be for building, and other uses; or if they hindered the growth of better trees: in all these cases they might be cut down, as the Jewish doctors resolve. Who, when they please, mind the reason of a law, and not the bare words; insomuch, that they extend this law to a great many other things, which they say might not be destroyed, if they were useful and profitable. No houses, for instance, nor garments, nor household-stuff; nor were they to stop up fountains, &c. (See Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 15. and Guil. Schickardus in Jus Regium, cap. 5. Theor. 18.)

For the tree of the field is man's life.] The word life is not in the Hebrew text; but we add it to make out the sense. In which we follow many good authors among the Jews, particularly Aben Ezra, who observes many such elliptical, i. e. concise forms of speech in Scripture. As in 1 Sam. xvi. 20. where an ass of bread, is an ass loaded with bread. So here the tree is a man, i. e. the life or support of man. Just as (xxiv. 6.) it is said, a man should not take the upper or nether millstone to pledge, ki nephesh hu, because it is his life, i. e. that whereby he gets his livelihood. But there are a great many who translate the words by way of interrogation (and the Hebrew will bear it), and, joining them with those that follow, make this the sense, Is the tree of the field a man, that it should come against thee in the siege? So the Vulgar, the Greek, and the Arabic translation, and the Chaldee paraphrast, and Josephus, as Mr. Selden observes, (lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 12.) As much as to say, They need not fear any danger from the trees, as if they were soldiers that could fight against them. And if this sense do not seem dilute (as some have censured it), there is no need of rendering the words by way of interrogation, but only of repeating the word not out of the foregoing words, in this manner, Thou shalt not cut them down, for the tree of the field is not a man, &c. Of this there are many examples, as Glassius and our Gataker have shewn. And thus R. Bechai among the Jews expounds these words; and the famous Abarbinel, who thus glosses upon them: "It is not decent to make war against trees, who have no hands to fight with thee, but against men only." And this sense Grotius follows, lib. iii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 12. sect. 2. where he produces Philo for this opinion, and Josephus, who says, "If trees could speak, they would cry out that it was unjust, that they who were no cause of the war should suffer the mischiefs of it." And thus Onkelos translates these words, and those that follow, For the tree of the field is not as a man, that it should come against thee in the siege; that is, they had no cause to fear trees, and therefore should not hurt them. But this is a reason against cutting down any trees whatsoever; whereas Moses speaks only of fruit-trees. From whence Grotius thinks that saying of the Pythagoreans took its original, ἥμερον φυτὸν καὶ ἔγκαρπον, &c. trees that do not grow wild, and bear fruit, ought not to be hurt, much less cut down. And yet it seems to be more agreeable to the Hebrew words, than our marginal translation, which makes this sense, That there are trees of the field sufficient to employ in the siege; so that they need not cut down fruit-trees to carry it on.

Ver. 20. Only the trees which thou knowest, that they be not trees for meat, thou shalt destroy and cut them down.] If it were necessary for the raising bulwarks (as it here follows), or otherways to distress the enemy, they had liberty to cut down trees that did not bear fruit; but not merely to make waste and desolation.

And thou shalt build bulwarks against the city that maketh war with thee.] From whence they battered the city, and threw great stones into it; as well as begirt them round, that no provisions might be brought in to them. Thus we find they did in aftertimes, 2 Chron. xxvi. 15. 2 Sam. xx. 15. And they must have some such inventions in Moses's days; or else how could they take cities fortified with such high walls as are mentioned Deut. i. 28.? Or to what purpose should they build bulwarks, and cast up banks, but from thence to batter the city with some engine or other?

Until it be subdued.] From these words the Jewish doctors conclude, that it was lawful to make war even upon the sabbath; because, having set down before a city, they were to proceed till it was subdued; which these words suppose might not be in a short time. Only they say, that the siege was to be begun at least three days before the sabbath. Thus these superstitious people, not thinking common reason sufficient to justify them in so plain a case, make the Scripture speak what it intended not for their warrant. See Schickard, in his Jus Regium, cap. 5. Theor. 18. where he alleges Maimonides in his Hilkoth Melachim to this purpose. And Joh. Benedictus Carpzovius produces a plainer out of Hilkoth Schabbath, where he delivers their sense in these words: "A siege is to be begun three days before the sabbath; and then it may be continued every day, even upon the sabbath, until the city be taken: and this may be done in a war that is voluntarily undertaken. For thus our wise men understand these words by ancient tradition, until it be subdued."

CHAP. XXI.

Ver. 1. IF one shall be found slain in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee to possess.] This follows very properly after the law he had delivered about making war; because then the bodies of dead men were most frequently found. About which the wisest lawgivers took the greatest care that inquisition should be made, how and by whom they were slain. This appears by Plato, who, in his ninth book de Legibus, hath a law something like to this, though far short of the solemnity that is here required to be used; as I shall observe in the conclusion of this statute.

Lying in the field, and it be not known who hath slain him.] The Hebrew doctors here stick too much to the letter of these words; for they will not have them reach to a dead body hanging in the air upon a tree, or hid in the sand or dust, or floating upon the water, which is extremely absurd.

Ver. 2. Then thy elders and thy judges shall come forth.] The great Sanhedrin were to send forth some of their members (so the Jews interpret it) to do what here follows. And indeed it may be thought that none but they could take care of this matter, the doubt being to which of the neighbouring cities (where the other judges lived) it belonged. Therefore the paraphrase ascribed to Uzielides saith, "Two of the wise men or elders, and three of the judges, were sent by the great Sanhedrin about this business." (See Selden, lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 7. n. 2.)

Yet he observes, in another part of that most learned work, (lib. ii. cap. 7. n. 3.) that there was a sort of elders who were not ordained by laying on of hands, but only were venerable persons for their age and prudence, who, some think, might serve for this employment. And they called such elders zickne hashuck, elders of the street, or vulgar elders. But none, I think, hath discoursed more critically upon these words, thy elders, and thy judges, than our Mr. Thorndike; who observes, that there had been judges constituted to determine causes by Jethro's advice, (Exod. xviii.) the greater causes being reserved for Moses alone. For whose assistance God afterward appointed seventy elders, (Numb. xi.) who made up the great court of judgment in that nation. Now they of this great consistory are called the elders of Israel: but they of other consistories, or inferior courts, are called barely elders, or elders of such a city. See Review of the Rites of the Church, p. 70. where he alleges this very place for it; and by thy elders, understands the elders of Israel; the lower elders being mentioned in the next verse. And so those of the great consistory are commonly called in the gospel: and in like manner, the scribes of the people, and thy scribes, signify there those of this high court. Whereas the bare name of scribes is extended further, to the inferior doctors of the law. As also the name of rulers, and that of rulers of the people, are to be understood with the like difference.

And they shall measure unto the cities that are round about him that is slain.] That is, if it were dubious what city lay nearest to the dead body, as it sometimes happened. But commonly, it is probable, at the first view they easily discerned this, and so did not trouble themselves to measure. It is a frivolous dispute in the Mischna, from whence they were to measure; whether from the navel, or the nose, or the forehead: which last seems more rational to Maimonides, who calls it the centre of the body. But they did not (if we believe the Jewish doctors), in their measuring, take notice of any city wherein there was not a court of twenty-three elders; and Jerusalem was always excepted. (See Selden in the place forenamed, n. 3. and L'Empereur upon Bava-kama, p. 173. and Wagenseil upon Sota, p. 899.) If the dead body lay nearest to the country of the gentiles, then they did not measure at all; but it was presumed the man was killed by them.

Ver. 3. And it shall be, that the city which is next to the slain man.] From whence it might be presumed the murderer came, or was fled thither, as Abarbinel discourses.

Even the elders of that city.] Who were different from the elders beforementioned (see the foregoing verse), for they returned to Jerusalem when they had seen the body buried, if there was no discovery of the murderer: and then the senators of the city next to the dead body, who were twenty-three, performed what is here ordered.

Shall take an heifer.] That was not above two years old; for if it were a day more, they might not use it for this purpose, as Maimonides and others affirm. Yet the Scripture, in other cases, mentions one of three years old, (Gen. xv. 9. Isa. xv. 5. Jer. xlviii. 5.) as Wagenseil observes upon the Mischna of Sota, cap. 9. sect. 3. annot. 2. If two cities happened to be equidistant from the dead body, they then joined together to provide this heifer.

Which hath not been wrought with.] Never used in ploughing the ground.

And which hath not drawn in the yoke.] This may seem to be included in the foregoing expression, as Maimonides observes; but it is added, he thinks, to signify, that if it had been employed in any other labour, it became improper for this use. Such heifers were accounted by the heathen to be most acceptable to their gods, as appears by Homer, in whom Diomedes and Nestor promise such an offering to Pallas. (See Bochart, lib. ii. Hieroz. cap. 33. p. 1. out of Iliad K. and Odyss. Γ.)

But there was a particular reason for such a one in this case (wherein the heifer was not to be offered), that it might the better represent, as many think, the person that had committed this murder, who was a son of Belial, subject to no law, and deserved to be beheaded as this heifer was. It is not required that it should be without blemish, as those heifers were to be that were offered at the tabernacle: but it sufficed if it had never been accustomed to the yoke. Yet this is not to be taken without all limitation; for if it wanted any member, or were diseased, it might not be employed in this service, as Wagenseil observes out of Maimonides, in the place beforenamed, p. 907.

Ver. 4. And the elders of that city shall bring down the heifer.] Their cities, it seems, were commonly seated on hills or high grounds.

Into a rough valley.] The Hebrew word nachal signifies both a valley and a torrent. The LXX., Josephus, and the Vulgar, understand it as we do; and the following words favour this interpretation. But the Talmudists and the rabbins, who generally follow them, take it to signify a torrent, which is the sense of Maimonides himself; and the next word ethan (which we translate rough) they interpret a rapid torrent. Chaskuni thinks there is some reason for this in the sixth verse, where they are required to wash their hands over the heifer in the water that is of the brook. I see nothing to hinder the putting both senses together; torrents being wont to run down violently from the mountains, through the valleys which lie beneath them, which is the cause that the same word signifies both.

Which is neither eared.] Or rather, ploughed.

Nor sown.] Being a stony, craggy ground, representing the horridness of the murder, and the cruelty and hardness of the man's heart who committed it. They that follow the other interpretation of nachal, understood the foregoing words, Ascher lo jeabeth bo, which we translate, neither eared, as if they signified the torrent did not serve to water the neighbouring ground: and these words to be meant of the soil which lay next to the torrent, in which nothing was sown. And, besides this variety, there are those who take ethan not to signify either that which is hard or rapid, but the most fertile ground: so R. Bechai, and lately R. Jac. Abendana, in his marginal notes upon Michlal Jophi, where he gives this reason for it; that the inhabitants of each city might be the more careful to prevent such murders, being in danger otherwise to lose the best ground belonging to their inheritance. For the land where the body was found

Digitized by Microsoft®

(if we may believe the Mischna) was never to be sown any more. (See Sota, cap. 9. sect. 5.)

And shall strike off the heifer's neck there in the valley.] Coming behind the heifer (saith the Mischna), as the murderer was supposed to have treacherously surprised the slain man; and should have been thus used, if he could have been found.

Ver. 5. And the priests, the sons of Levi.] See chap. xvii. 9. 18. xviii. 1.

Shall come near.] To see all performed according to the law, and to pray to God for the country in the words prescribed, ver. 8.

For them the Lord thy God hath chosen to minister unto him, and to bless in the name of the Lord.] See Exod. xxviii. 1, &c. Numb. vi. 23, &c.

And by their word shall every controversy and every stroke be tried.] They did not determine all matters whatsoever, but all of this nature; in which the law appointed them to take care things were done according to it. As in the killing the red heifer; the examination of the woman suspected of adultery by the water of jealousy; the leprosy, whether in men, or houses, or garments. Thus the Hebrews explain these words. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 8.) And so Bonfrerius here acknowledges, that they did not come hither as judges, but as directors; and that they might purge themselves, together with the elders, from all guilt of this crime.

Ver. 6. And all the elders of that city, that are next to the slain man.] If there were never so many elders in the city, they were all to clear themselves by doing what follows.

Shall wash their hands over the heifer, &c.] In the water of the brook which flowed through the valley; protesting their innocence, in the words prescribed in the next verse. So Chaskuni glosses, "As our hands are clean, so are we from the guilt of this blood." See Wagenseil upon Sota, p. 910. who thinks Pilate had respect to this rite, when he condemned our Saviour, (Matt. xxvii. 24.) notwithstanding all that learned men have said to the contrary.

Ver. 7. And they shall answer and say.] Being asked, perhaps, whether they knew any thing of this murder.

Our hands have not shed this blood, neither have our eyes seen it.] That is, they professed solemnly they knew not who shed it, nor how the man came to be slain. And the Mischna beforementioned adds, that they said, (for how can any one think that elders would be murderers?) "This man did not come into our city that we know of, and dismissed without necessary provisions; nor was seen by us, and permitted to go away without company." Which Maimonides expresses more largely in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 40. where he represents the wisdom of this law in these words: "The elders called God to witness, that they had not neglected to secure the ways, nor to set watches to examine diligently those that travelled, saying (as our rabbins express it), This man was not killed through any negligence, or forgetfulness, which we are guilty of, in not observing our public constitutions; nor do we know who killed him. Now, by this inquisition into the fact, by this going forth of the elders, and the striking off the heifer's head, &c. a great deal of discourse necessarily arose about this business, which made the thing public, and was a probable means of discovering the murderer, by some or other who were there, or should hear of all this." And if any one came, and said he knew the author, then they forbore to behead the heifer: but the man being apprehended, if the house of judgment did not put him to death, the king had power to do it: if he neglected it, the avenger of blood might kill him wheresoever he met him. By which it appears, that this solemn process here mentioned tended very much to detect the murderer. Unto which this also contributed, that the place where the heifer's head was struck off might never be ploughed or sowed hereafter (as I noted before), which made the owners of that ground employ their utmost diligence to find out the murderer, that their land might not lie waste for ever; for they might not so much as plant a tree upon it.

Ver. 8. Be merciful, O Lord, unto thy people Israel, whom thou hast redeemed, and lay not innocent blood unto thy people of Israel's charge.] The priests alone pronounced these words, as the Mischna there saith; though Josephus (who often differs from the Talmudists) saith, Both priests and elders prayed God to be propitious unto them, and to prevent the like evil from falling out again in their region. (See Selden, lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 7. n. 5, 6.)

And the blood shall be forgiven them.] These are not the words of the priests, saith the same Mischna, but the Holy Ghost pronounces, That when they observed these rites, the guilt should be removed from them; which, in some sort, would have lain upon them, if they had taken no notice of a murder committed so near to their city, nor made inquisition after it, and expressed their abhorrence of it.

Ver. 9. So shalt thou put away the guilt of innocent blood from among you, when thou shalt do that which is right in the sight of the Lord.] Sincerely protesting their innocence and detestation of this fact: which was to be done in the day-time, and not in the night; and the body of the heifer was to be buried, but none of it eaten, or any part employed to other use. If the murderer was found before its head was struck off, it was to be let go into the pasture among other beasts; if after, he was to suffer capital punishment, that is, to be cut off by the sword, as the Mischna beforementioned explains it, cap. 9. sect. 7.

By all this it appears, that no ancient law made such provision for the discovery and expiation of secret murders, as this of Moses. For the very best of them, which is that of Plato, enacts no more than this, that if a man was found dead, and he that killed him, after a diligent search, could not be heard of, public proclamation should be made, that he who was guilty of the fact should not come into any holy place, nor any part of the whole country; for if he were discovered and apprehended he should be put to death, Καὶ ἔξω τῆς τοῦ παθόντος Χώρας ἐκβληθησόμενον ἄταφον, and be thrown out of the bounds of the country, and have no burial, (lib. ix. de Legibus, p. 874.)

Ver. 10. When thou goest to war against thine enemies.] To a voluntary war against any of their neighbouring nations, not against the people of Canaan, none of which were to be spared, if they stood out and fought, but destroyed by the Divine precept, which required this war.

And the Lord thy God hath delivered them into thy hands, and thou hast taken them captive.] As the manner was, to make them slaves to their conquerors.

Ver. 11. And seest among the captives a beautiful woman.] It was indifferent whether she was a virgin, or a widow, or a wife, according to the Jewish doctors.

Digitized by Microsoft®

And hast a desire unto her, that thou wouldest have her to thy wife.] The plain meaning is, fell so passionately in love with her, as to desire to marry her, though a stranger, of another nation and religion. It is a common opinion, indeed, among the Jewish doctors, that a baser sort of passion is here indulged; for it was lawful, they imagine, for a soldier to lie with such a captive once to satisfy his lust (which some make to be the meaning of this expression, hast a desire to her, or, as it is in the Hebrew, hast cleaved to her), but not repeat it, unless he would take her for his wife: which they think was allowed to military men when they were absent from their wives, to prevent greater outrages, which were wont to be committed by the heathen. But the best nations severely prohibited all such abuses, as Grotius observes, lib. iii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 4. sect. xix. 1. And though Schickard, in his Mischpat Hammelech, endeavours to make out the wisdom of this law in permitting a Hebrew soldier to enjoy a captive once, (see p. 130, 131. and Mr. Selden, lib. v. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 13.) yet he cannot but acknowledge that some of the Jews do not allow of this interpretation, but are of opinion, that he might not touch a captive till she became a proselyte, and he took her for his wife. Thus R. Bechai, as Grotius observes in the place forenamed, sect. xix. 2. "God would have the camp of Israel holy, and not defiled with fornication, and other abominations, as the camps of the gentiles." Unto whom Alexander himself gave a better example; who being extremely taken with the beauty of Roxana, did not abuse her as a captive, but vouchsafed to marry her, and make her his wife; for which he is justly commended, both by Arrianus and by Plutarch; and therefore I think it is most reasonable to expound this law, only of taking such a captive in marriage; which Abarbinel also shews is the most ancient interpretation of it, and hath the best authority on its side among the Jews. For though he acknowledges it is the common opinion of their wise men, that a soldier might lie with a fair captive once, whilst she was a mere gentile; yet herein they followed the doctors in the Babylonian Talmud, which is not of so great antiquity as the Jerusalem Talmud, where R. Johannes (in Massecheth Sanhedrin) delivers the quite contrary doctrine, that it was not lawful for any Israelite to lie with such a woman at all, till the conditions, mentioned in the following words of this law, were fulfilled, when he was to make her his wife. And according to the judgment of this R. Johannes, Abarbinel explains this law in a large commentary on this place.

Ver. 12. Then thou shalt bring her home to thine house.] The forenamed doctors, who are so indulgent to the soldiers' lust, will have this to signify, that they were to observe the rules of modesty in the camp, and not openly lie with her like beasts, but privately in their tents. Thus Maimonides himself, More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 41. But it is evident Moses doth not speak of any thing done in the camp, but of what was to be done when he returned to his house; where he was to dispose her, in the manner following, to be his wife.

And she shall shave her head.] These and the following words are variously interpreted, some taking these things to be done to her, with a design to abate his affection to her, that he might not marry her at all; and others, to prepare her, and make her fit for his bed. For shaving her head (which every one knows was used in mourning) deprived her of one of her greatest ornaments, and made her less amiable, and consequently might extinguish his affection, which was kindled by her beauty. So Clemens Alexandrinus understands it. (See lib. ii. Strom. p. 398, 399. and lib. iii. p. 456.) And many of the Hebrews are of the same mind, that these things were ordered to lessen his affection to her, by making her appear less lovely in his eyes. (See Schickard's Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 5. Theor. 17. p. 134, 135.) But there are others who take this to have been a kind of purification, and cleansing her from her gentilism; and a token of her becoming a new woman, that she might be meet to be made his wife.

And pare her nails.] This likewise was a piece of cleanliness and neatness. But they who are of the other opinion translate the words, Let her nails grow, as our marginal translation hath it, and the Arabic, and Chaldee, and the Hebrew doctors commonly understand it; which was intended to make her look ugly, and to slack his love to her. At least, it was suitable to the condition of a mourner, as she plainly was, it appears by the next verse. The Hebrew words, indeed (which are, make her nails), are dubious; from whence arose that dispute we find in the Talmud, between R. Eliezer, who expounds it pare her nails, to make them look handsome; and R. Akiba, who expounds it, let them grow. The former reasons thus: The hair and the nails are to be used alike. Now her hair is plainly ordered to be cut; and therefore so were her nails to be. But the other doctor turns it quite contrary: What was ordered about her hair, was to make her abominable; therefore this also was intended to make her appear ill-favoured. And, indeed, the Hebrew word being indifferent to either sense, we must judge of the meaning by the circumstances of the place: and here they seem to lead us to R. Akiba's interpretation; which Onkelos, a most judicious paraphrast, follows; and many learned men in later times, particularly Schickard in the book beforementioned, p. 134. and Martinus Gierus de Luctu Hebræorum, cap. 14. sect. 5.

Ver. 13. And she shall put the raiment of her captivity from off her.] Her fine clothes, wherein they suppose her to have been taken captive; instead of which she was to put on sordid apparel, which was the habit of mourners. This still tended to cool his love; the drift of these things being (as the Jews commonly think) to take away from her all that was inviting and tempting, that so such marriages might not be common among them.

And shall remain in thy house.] Nor stir out of doors, but be retired; as persons in a mournful condition are wont to be.

And bewail her father and mother.] Who, perhaps, were killed in the war; or rather, whom she was likely to see no more. And this also the Jews suppose might help to abate his affection to her: sorrow and grief very much spoiling one's beauty.

A full month.] So long the Jews were allowed to bewail their dead relations, or at least those who were eminent, as they did Aaron and Moses. And here I cannot but observe how Philo magnifies this constitution, and plainly shews he was of the opinion of R. Johannes beforementioned, that this captive might not be touched till all these things were performed. Πάνυ καλῶς ἕκαστα διαταξάμενος, (saith he, in his book περὶ φιλανθρωπίας, p. 545, &c.) "Moses ordered every thing most excellently in this law: first, in not letting the reins loose to men's desires, but restraining them for thirty days. In which time, secondly, a trial was made of his love; whether it was a furious ungovernable passion, or had something of reason in it, which advises us to do nothing suddenly, but after serious and long deliberation. And, thirdly, Ἐλεεῖ τὸν αἰχμάλωτον. This was a merciful law to the captive, that, if she were a virgin, she might bewail her unhappiness, in not being disposed of in marriage by her parents: if a widow, that she had lost her first love, and was now to be married to one who would be her lord, as well as her husband."

And after that.] Upon these words R. Johannes grounded his opinion, that, till a full month was spent in the forementioned ceremonies, he might not lie with her.

Thou shalt go in unto her, and be her husband, and she shall be thy wife.] If he continued, that is, to love her at the end of the month, and she was willing to embrace the Jewish religion, in which, while she remained retired in his house, she was instructed. For the Jewish doctors agree she was to be baptized, and not merely made a proselyte of the gate (i. e. renounce idolatry), otherwise he might not marry her. And if she refused to embrace their religion entirely, Maimonides saith, they gave her a year's time to consider of it; at the end of which, if she remained still obstinate, they required her at least to observe the seven precepts of the sons of Noah, and so to become a proselyte of the gate; otherwise she was to be slain. But though she was so converted, no Jew might take her to wife; for such a marriage, Maimonides saith, was counted impious.

Those Hebrew doctors who think a soldier might enjoy her once, at the first taking her captive, have added another conceit to this, viz. that there was not only this month's time allowed her to bewail her parents, but that he was to stay two months more, before he might go in to her and be her husband, that he might see whether she were with child or not, by his first enjoyment of her. For if she were, a great difference was to be made between that child, and those she might have by him after marriage. Concerning which, see Selden, lib. v. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 13. where he observes, they make Tamar, the daughter of David, an instance of this; whose mother being a captive, they suppose he lay with her as soon as she was taken, and had this issue by her; but afterward she becoming a proselyte, he made her his wife, and she bare him Absalom. Whereby it came to pass, that there was not such a relation between her and the other sons of David by other women, but that it had been lawful for Amnon to have married her.

But all this is judged by the famous Abarbinel (upon 2 Sam. xiii.) to be very absurd; and neither believes that David would have committed such a fact, as to lie with a woman in her gentilism; nor, if he had, that this child would have been looked upon as a gentile, since he afterward married her mother. And therefore he takes those words of Tamar, ver. 13. "Speak to the king, and he will not withhold me from thee," to be a mere put-off, as we speak, to get rid of his company; which Amnon understood very well, who, knowing he could not have her to wife, proceeded to force her.

Ver. 14. And it shall be, if thou have no delight in her, then thou shalt let her go whither she will.] If at the month's end, or before, his mind was changed, and he did not like to take her for his wife, then he might neither meddle with her any more (as the Hebrew doctors understand it), nor keep her any longer as a slave, nor sell her, or make merchandize of her (as the text here expressly orders), but give her liberty to go whither she herself thought good. This he lost, say the Jews, by his short pleasure he took at first. For other captives, whom a man had made himself master of, by the law of war, he might employ in his work as slaves, or make money of them; but one whom he had lain with, he was either to marry, or set her at liberty. This they ground upon the last words of this verse, which I shall shew may have another interpretation. And therefore I shall not insist upon their sense (which depends upon the same words), who think Moses speaks of his not liking her after she was become his wife, her humour, manners, and conversation, being disagreeable to him; in which case he was to give her a bill of divorce, as he might do another wife, but not keep her as a slave.

Because thou hast humbled her.] It must be acknowledged that this is an usual phrase, for having had carnal knowledge of a woman, as the Scripture modestly elsewhere speaks, in the like case. It signifies so in the very next chapter of this book, Deut. xxii. 29. Judg. xix. 24. xx. 2. and many other places, where it is used for violence offered to a woman, which was the greatest affliction to her, as the Hebrew word properly signifies. From which I see no reason why we should depart in this place; for it was sufficient affliction and humiliation to a captive woman (as Carpzovius observes, in his annotations upon Schickard's book, which I have so often named), that, after she had been brought into a soldier's house, and kept there a month, having her head shaved, garments changed, &c. in hope of marriage, she was rejected at last, when it should have been consummated. And thus Abarbinel here understands the word humbled, not of his lying with her, but of all the forementioned conditions, which were imposed upon her as a preparation for his bed, and of her disappointment after she had submitted to be baptized. And, indeed, the Hebrew word denotes any sort of affliction. (See Exod. i. 11. Psal. lxxxviii. 8. lxxxix. 23. xc. 15. xciv. 5, &c.)

Ver. 15. If a man have two wives, one beloved, and another hated.] That is, less loved; as the word hated sometimes signifies, Gen. xxix. 31. Matt. vi. 24. R. Solomon thinks that this case follows the other, because it might so happen, that, if a man suffered himself to be carried with too violent a passion towards such a woman as is beforementioned, it might turn into hatred, when he found her not to be agreeable to him.

And they have borne him children, both the beloved and the hated.] Towards which it was likely he would be affected very differently, as he was to his wives.

And if the first-born son be hers that was hated.] As it fell out in the case of Leah and Rachel.

Ver. 16. Then it shall be when he makes his sons to inherit that which he hath, that he may not make the son of the beloved first-born, &c.] He speaks of sons; for daughters were not to have a double portion. And he speaks of sons (as the Jews will have it) born before the death of their father; to whom he divided his inheritance. For a posthumous son had not a double portion, as the Gemara upon Bathra saith. (See Selden de Successionibus, cap. 7. p. 29.)

Ver. 17. But he shall acknowledge the son of the hated for the first-born.] Which had his first love, and was to enjoy the effects of it.

By giving him a double portion of all that he hath.] Of all that he was in possession of when he died; but not of that which was his in reversion after his death; as Mr. Selden shews the opinion of the Jewish lawyers is, lib. de Success. cap. 6. p. 24.

For he is the beginning of his strength.] See Gen. xlix. 1.

The right of the first-born is his.] By a very ancient custom, antecedent to the law, which made the first-born the head of the family, and gave him as much more as any of his brethren of the estate belonging to it, that he might be able to maintain and support the dignity of it, (Gen. xxv. 31.) But if there was no son, and the inheritance was to be divided among daughters, the eldest daughter had not a double share of the estate; as Mr. Selden shews in the same book, cap. 8.

Ver. 18. If a man have a stubborn and rebellious son.] By a stubborn son, the Jews understand one that will not do as he is bidden, and by a rebellious, one that doth what he is forbidden. And they imagine this law is annexed to the foregoing, about the marriage of a soldier to a captive woman, because the issue of such marriages commonly proved refractory, or at least gave their parents great trouble. So Schickard observes out of Tanchuma. And they confirm it by an example out of Scripture, viz. the two children of David, Absalom and Tamar, who were both born of a captive woman, made a proselyte: the former of which conspired the death of his father; and the other being ravished by Amnon, was the occasion of the death of some of her brethren. (Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 5. Theor. 17.)

Which will not obey the voice of his father, or the voice of his mother.] Behaved himself not only undutifully, but crossly to them; and with such contempt of their authority, as argued he had not only lost all filial affection and reverence to them, but would, if he could, undo them.

And that, when they have chastened him, will not hearken unto them.] Is never the better for admonitions, reprehensions, and corrections, which they were bound to give him.

Ver. 19. Then shall his father and his mother lay hold of him.] It is absurd to say, as the Hebrew doctors do (in their qualifications of this law), that his parents were with their own hands to apprehend him, and bring him before the court; though it seems reasonable enough, that both father and mother should agree in the complaint against him, and desire officers might be sent to lay hold of him. In which one cannot well suppose that they would consent to have such a punishment as follows inflicted upon him, unless he were intolerable.

And bring him unto the elders of his city.] Who were to examine the proofs, and accordingly to pass sentence upon him. Concerning these elders, see ver. 3, 4.

And unto the gate of his place.] Where the court of judgment was wont to sit. (See xvi. 18.) The paternal power among the ancient Romans was so great, that they might put their children to death, as they did their slaves, without any process before a magistrate. And this some have taken to be a natural right; and imagined God would not have commanded Abraham to kill his son, but that it was a part of his inherent power. However this be, they were not thought fit to be long entrusted with it; for God here orders, by Moses, that it should be committed to the public judges, as the most disinterested persons.

Ver. 20. And they shall say unto the elders of his city.] This seems to intimate the authority of parents was still so preserved, that their testimony alone was sufficient to convict a rebellious son, without any further proof. The Hebrew doctors, indeed, are of another mind, as I shall shew in the explication of what follows.

This our son is stubborn and rebellious, he will not obey our voice.] This is to be understood, say they, of a son that was no less than thirteen years old and a day; and so might be presumed to know his duty, and to be capable of being governed by counsel and good advice; and this is reasonable enough: but what they say concerning the time when he became his own man is monstrously absurd. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 13. p. 559, 560.) What they say of a daughter, not to be comprehended under this law, may be admitted, because she was not capable to do so much mischief in a family as a rebellious son.

He is a glutton and a drunkard.] These sins are no where made capital by the law of Moses, but when they were accompanied with rebellious disobedience to parents, who were to bring witnesses, as the Hebrew doctors say, that this son had stolen some of their goods, and sold them, that he might spend the money in these vices; under which others are comprehended, which usually attend them; and that he had done this, after he had been admonished and chastised: so that he was not to be punished as this law at last prescribes, till he was grown incorrigible. For, they say, the court was first to order him to be whipped, and not to proceed further till, upon a new complaint, it was proved that he had run into the same riotous courses since that punishment. Then, upon this second testimony (as they call it), the court gave sentence against him, that he should be stoned to death, unless the parents, before the sentence was pronounced, said they gave him their pardon. There are a great many little niceties about the quantity of meat and wine that he ate and drank, and other matters; with which I do not think fit to trouble the reader.

Ver. 21. And all the men of his city shall stone him with stones, that he die.] This is such a severe sentence, that it inclines me to think, the parents looked upon such a son as so debauched, that he would not only spend all their estate, if he had it, but was inclined to kill them, that he might get it into his own hands. For the sentence of death is denounced, elsewhere, against one that struck his father or mother, (Exod. xxi. 15.) or that cursed them, (ver. 17.) It is not said, indeed, he should be stoned, but put to death; which they interpret of strangling; this punishment of stoning being appointed for idolaters and blasphemers of God; next to whom parents are to be reverenced, being in God's place, with respect to their children. (See upon the fifth commandment.) And therefore other nations were very severe in their punishment of such children as are here described; and particularly the Romans, after the power was taken from parents to sell them, or put them to death, and the censure of them committed to the magistrates. (See Hen. Stephen. in his Fontes et Rivi Juris Civilis, p. 18.) And among the Athenians, Lysias saith (in his oration against Agoratus), He that beats his parents, or did not maintain them, and provide a habitation for them, when they were in want, ἄξιός ἐστι θανάτῳ ζημιωθῆναι, deserved to be put to death. The law indeed did not inflict that punishment, but only said, ἄτιμος ἔστω, let him be infamous; that is, as they expound it, he might not come into the public assemblies, nor enter into their temples, nor wear a crown in their public festivals; and if any such persons presumed so to do, they were brought before the magistrates, who set a fine upon their heads, and committed them to prison till they paid it. (See Sam. Petitus, in his Commentary upon the Attic Laws, lib. ii. tit. 4. p. 163.) No wonder therefore Moses ordained this punishment, when a son was come to such a degree of profligate wickedness, that he endeavoured to undo his parents. Which some states have thought fit to follow in these latter ages: for David Chytræus saith, he himself saw an example of this severity at Zurich, in the year one thousand five hundred and fifty; where a disobedient son was beheaded, who had cursed his mother, and beaten her.

So shalt thou put evil away from among you; and all Israel shall hear, and fear.] See concerning this before upon xix. 20.

Ver. 22. If a man have committed a sin worthy of death, and he be put to death.] There were several sorts of capital punishments; viz. strangling, burning, cutting off by the sword, and stoning. Now the Hebrew doctors limit this unto such offenders as were stoned; of which punishment he speaks in the foregoing verse. But there being eighteen sorts of offenders, who were to be sentenced to this death, they put a further limitation upon these words; their tradition being, as they tell us, the sin worthy of death (or stoning) is only idolatry or blasphemy. So we read in the Sanhedrin, cap. 6. sect. 4. "All that were stoned were also hanged, according to the opinion of R. Eliezer: but the wise men say none were hanged but the idolater and blasphemer." And they add there, that only men, not women, were thus used; for which I can see no reason, but the sticking to the mere letter of these words; as if the word man did not comprehend both sexes.

But if we examine the Scripture, we shall find this not to be true (that no men were hanged but they that were stoned), for the king of Ai was hanged, (Josh. viii. 29.) and five kings more, (x. 26.) and they were not hanged because they were blasphemers or idolaters (for then all the rest of the Canaanites should have been so treated), but because they were such enemies of God, as had rebelliously withstood the gracious summons of surrender. And there are other examples also which confute this; as, the two traitors that murdered Ish-bosheth, (2 Sam. iv. 12.) and the five sons of Saul, (2 Sam. xxi. 9.) It is more probable, therefore, that all those whom the judges thought to be such great offenders, that it was fit to make them very public examples, were hanged up after they had suffered the punishment of death, to which they were sentenced. This seems to be denoted in the word chatta, which signifies sometimes a very great crime, as appears from Hosea xii. 8. where he speaks of iniquity, which is sin: not as if all iniquity were not sin; but some acts of iniquity were not so heinous, as to be called by that name.

And thou hang him.] After he had been put to death, as appears by the foregoing words, which speak of his being put to death before this suspension: which shews that this punishment was not the same with the Roman crucifixion (as Baronius, Sigonius, Lipsius, and others, have mistaken), for they hanged men alive upon the gibbet; whereby they expired before they were taken down: but this was only hanging up their bodies after they were dead, and exposing them to open shame for a time.

On a tree.] On a piece of timber (saith the Sanhedrin) struck into the ground; out of which came a beam, whereunto his hands were tied, as they tell us in the place beforementioned: and so Schickard, in his Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 4. Theor. 14. So that his body hung in such a posture as crucified men did.

Ver. 23. His body shall not remain all night upon the tree, but thou shalt in any wise bury him that day.] This is excellently interpreted by Josephus, lib. iv. Archæol. cap. 8. Μείνας δ' ὅλης τῆς ἡμέρας εἰς θέαν τῶν ἁπάντων, ταφῆσθαι νυκτός. Having remained the whole day a spectacle unto all, he was to be buried at night: for as soon as the sun went down, the body also was taken down. Examples of which we have in the book of Joshua, viii. 29. x. 26, 27. In which he is far more sincere than their rabbins, who say the law was satisfied if they hanged up the body just before the setting of the sun, and presently after took it down again: which exposition seems to have been contrived in favour of their countrymen; for only Israelites, they confess, were to be thus exposed, not proselytes of the gate, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. &c. cap. 12.

For he that is hanged is accursed of God.] The Jews interpret this clause, as if the meaning were, he was hanged because he blasphemed God. So Onkelos himself, and the Samaritan versions, with those of the Spanish and Mauritanian Jews, as Selden observes, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 13. n. 4. and Hottinger, in his Smegma Orientale, p. 96, 97. But though this be a common opinion among the Hebrew doctors, yet the LXX. have taken the sense right, Ὅτι κεκατηραμένος ὑπὸ Θεοῦ πᾶς κρεμάμενος ἐπὶ ξύλου. Cursed of God is every one that is hanged on a tree. And so St. Paul, Galat. iii. with very little difference. For they observed what those doctors did not, that Moses doth not here give a reason why the man was hanged up, but why he was to be taken down from the gallows. Now what consequence is there in this, Let him be taken down, and buried, because he cursed God? Every one sees that (though the word cursed should be taken in an active sense) this is not a right interpretation of these words: for though it had been good sense to have said, Let him be hanged, because he cursed God; yet not let him be taken down for that reason. Now such persons are here said to be accursed of God, not because they were hanged up, but because of their sin, which deserved they should be thus exposed. So St. Jerome upon Galatians iii. "Non ideo maledictus quia pendet, sed ideo pendet quia maledictus:" he was not accursed because he was hanged, but he was therefore hanged because he was accursed: hanging up being a token that the man had committed a horrid crime, whereby he had incurred the high displeasure of Almighty God. So that every one who saw him hang on that fashion was to think with himself, This man was under the curse of God, because of his sin; and unless he had undergone this curse, he could not have been buried, and put into the condition of other men. But when he had undergone it for his sin, then it had been a sin in the people not to have taken him down, or prolonged his suspension longer than God imposed this curse upon him. And the land had been defiled, if, after this suffering which God had appointed, they had not buried him. To this purpose Abarbinel, who refutes several other accounts of this matter, particularly that of Sol. Jarchi, who thinks he was not to hang longer than till the evening, because it would have been a dishonour to the Sovereign of the world, after whose image man was made. This is followed by many, and even by Grotius himself, who gives no other reason of it, in his book de Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. ii. cap. 19. sect. 4. But this is a reason, as Abarbinel notes, why he should not have been hanged up at all. It may be also usefully noted further, that they say in the tract called Sanhedrin, that not only the malefactor, but all the instruments of punishment, were to be buried at the going down of the sun. Even the tree itself, upon which he was hanged, was to be buried, "that no memory of so foul a thing might be left in the world; nor any might say, Behold, this was the tree upon which such a one was hanged."

That the land be not defiled which the Lord thy God giveth thee.] By the stench of the body, after it petrified, as the same Abarbinel expounds it, who observes, that the dead body of no creature corrupts and stinks sooner than that of a man, which is exceeding offensive to the living. For which cause, saith he, the book Siphri determines, not only that all malefactors should be buried as soon as the law here orders (that they might not imitate the manners of the Egyptians and Philistines, and such-like people, who let bodies rot in the air after they were hanged up), but that every man should bury his dead the same day they died, or be deemed to have transgressed a negative precept; which may pass for a very good natural reason of it: but there is something more in it, respecting a legal pollution, under which their whole country lay, as long as an accursed thing hung openly among them; just as all that entered into the tent where a dead body lay, and all that was in it, were made unclean by it, (Numb. xix. 14, 15.) Upon which score St. Paul might well apply this passage to Christ crucified for us; not only because he bare our sins, and was put to death, and exposed to such shame as these sinners were, who were accursed of God; but was also taken down in the evening, in token now the guilt was removed; as the curse upon the man that was hanged ended at the going down of the sun; and as the land of Israel was pure and clean, after the dead body was taken down and buried, with the tree upon which it was hanged. Joh. Coch hath well explained this, in his notes upon the Sanhedrin, cap. 6. sect. 5. whose sense in short is this: As our blessed Saviour, while he hung upon the cross, was made a curse, and an execration; so, when, according to the law, he was taken down and buried, both he ceased to be a curse, and all they that are his.

CHAP. XXII.

Ver. 1. THOU shalt not see thy brother's ox or his sheep go astray, and hide thyself from them.] They were not to turn away their face, as if they did not see them, and so neglect them. And by brother is to be understood, not only an Israelite, but any man that lived among them; this being a matter of common right, and extended to their enemies as well as their friends, (Exod. xxiii. 4.)

Thou shalt in any case bring them again to thy brother.] Not merely give notice to the owner where he saw them, but take care himself to bring them back, that they might not go further astray, and perhaps be quite lost, before the owner could have notice of them. This and many that follow are precepts of humanity, and care of each other's welfare, without which society could not be preserved.

Ver. 2. And if thy brother be not nigh thee, or thou know him not; then thou shalt bring it to thine own house.] And preserve it there, till he could send to him, or find who the owner was.

And it shall be with thee until thy brother seek after it.] He was to give notice, by the public crier, that such a beast was with him, and that, as the Jews say, three or four times, that the owner might seek after it. But here they are pleased to make a distinction: that they were to do this, if there were marks upon the beast; but if there were none, they were not bound to cry it: which doth not seem to be reasonable. (See Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 4.)

And thou shalt restore it to him again.] He paying the charges of keeping it, from the time it was brought to his house till its being restored. But if nobody could prove a right in the beasts that were lost, they became his who found them, and he might lawfully keep them; for no other owner appearing, they were his that was in present possession of them, who did very piously, if he gave the value of them to the poor (and so the law was in many places); but he was an honest owner of them, if he kept them to himself; as Grotius observes, lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 10. sect. 11.

Ver. 3. In like manner shalt thou do with his ass, and so shalt thou do with his raiment, and with all lost things, &c.] In all other cases of like nature, the same law was to be observed.

Thou mayest not hide thyself.] Pass them by with neglect, or pretend they did not see them.

Ver. 4. Thou shalt not see thy brother's ass or his ox fall down by the way, and hide thyself from them.] Turn away, as if they did not see the danger they were in.

Thou shalt surely help him to lift them up again.] This hath been explained upon Exod. xxiii. 5. I shall only add here a famous example of this sort of piety, in Alphonsus king of Naples; who, travelling upon the road, attended by a great number of courtiers, and seeing a poor ass with a burden fallen into a deep slough (whom all that went before him passed by without any regard), when he came to the place, stopped, and went himself to the driver, and lent him assistance to help the ass out of the dirt. So David Chytræus upon this place.

Ver. 5. The woman shall not wear that which pertaineth unto a man, neither shall a man put on a woman's garment: for all that do so are abomination unto the Lord thy God.] The last words of this place plainly indicate, that it was an idolatrous custom, which is here prohibited. For Moses and the prophets are wont to speak in these terms of utmost abhorrence concerning such matters. And nothing was more common among the heathen, than for men, in the worship of several of their gods, to put on the garments usually worn by women, and women those worn by men; particularly in the worship of Venus, women appeared before her in armour, and men in women's apparel. And thus the words literally run here in the Hebrew; Women shall not put on the armour of a man (so the word celi frequently signifies armour, as well as other sorts of instruments), nor a man (στολὴν the LXX. translate it) the stole of a woman. (See Selden, Syntag. ii. de Diis Syris, cap. 4.) And thus Maimonides saith he found this precept in an old magical book, that men ought to stand before the star of Venus in the flowered garment of women, and women put on the armour of men before the star of Mars. (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 37.) Servius also, upon the second book of Æneids, mentions a statue of Venus at Cyprus (in which island were anciently many colonies of Phœnicians), to whom the women sacrificed in men's garments, and the men in women's. Many other nations did the same. (See I. Ger. Vossius, lib. ii. de Orig. et Progr. Idol. cap. 27. 31. but especially our learned Dr. Spencer, lib. ii. cap. 17. sect. 1, &c.)

But setting aside all this, every one knows, that if there were no distinction of sexes made by their habits, it would open a door to all manner of impurity; for which reason, if there were no other, this law was very wise and pious.

Ver. 6. If a bird's-nest chance to be before thee in the way in any tree, or on the ground, &c.] By this place, among others, (particularly Psal. viii. 8.) it appears the word tsippor signifies all kinds of birds, and not only the smaller sort, as some have imagined, but he seems particularly to speak of clean birds, such as it was lawful for them to eat. And this precept seems to have been given, to breed in the Jews a sense of a Divine Providence, extending itself to all creatures, and to teach them to exercise their dominion over them without any kind of cruelty.

Thou shalt not take the dam with the young.] R. Menachem, mentioned both by Drusius and Bochartus, was of opinion, that it is not pity towards birds which is intended in this law, but kindness to mankind; whom God intended by this usage of other creatures, to form unto gentleness and commiseration towards one another. But others, I think, have more truly determined, that this is a merciful constitution, with respect to birds as well as men; it being a sufficient affliction, as Maimonides calls it, to the old one to lose her young; it being unreasonable also that men should consider only their own present interest without regard to posterity, to whom the breed ought to be continued, by letting the old one go free. Unto which those verses, commonly ascribed to Phocylides, have respect:

Μηδέ τις ὄρνιθας καλιῆς ἅμα πάντας ἑλέσθω,
Μητέρα δ' ἐκπρολίπῃς, ἵν' ἔχῃς πάλι τῆς τε νεοττούς.

i. e. Let no man take all the birds together out of a nest; but let the mother go, that thou mayest have young ones again of her.

Ver. 7. Thou shalt in any wise let the dam go, and take the young to thee.] For there is a great deal of ill-nature in it, to take away the liberty and the life of any creature, from whom we have received a benefit; as Bonfrerius glosses upon these words.

That it may be well with thee, and that thou mayest prolong thy days.] Some of the Jews, from these words, have fancied, that the observation of this single precept was of such great value, as to procure for them even forgiveness of sins, and a long life; which is such a foolish conceit, that it makes all other precepts unnecessary. The plain meaning is, that God would reward them for their kind usage even of brute creatures, if other virtues were not wanting, such as charity towards their poor neighbours. And so the Mischna, in the conclusion of the tract called Cholin, discourses very well: "If in a light precept concerning a thing which is scarce worth a farthing, the law says, That it may be well with thee, and thou mayest prolong thy days; how much more may this be expected in the weightier things of the law?"

Ver. 8. When thou buildest a new house, then thou shalt make a battlement for thy roof.] The Jews, I think, are a little too curious, in setting a mark upon the word thy, fancying, he saith, not simply the roof, but thy roof, to except the temple, and the synagogues, and schools, from this rule; which were no private man's house, but belonged to the whole congregation. They say, indeed, the temple had battlements; but not for necessity, but for ornament, because the roof of the temple was not flat, as the roof of another house was; for nobody walked upon the temple, as they did upon their own houses, to take the air, and discourse together, or to meditate and pray (in little closets they had there), which made it necessary to have these battlements, of three foot and a half high (as the Jews say), to prevent any man's falling down, when he did not attend, but was thinking of some other thing. (See Constant. L'Empereur, in his annotations on Codex Middoth, p. 160.)

That the roofs of their houses were flat, which was the ground of this precept, we have many proofs in the Scripture. For hither Rahab brought the spies, and covered them with the stalks of flax, which she laid upon them, (Josh. ii. 6.) Here Samuel communed with Saul, upon the top of the house, (1 Sam. ix. 25.) David also was walking upon the roof of his palace, when he saw Bath-sheba washing herself, (2 Sam. xi. 2.) And in the same place Absalom caused a tent to be spread, that he might go in to his father's concubines in the sight of all Israel, (xvi. 22. see also Isa. xv. 3. xxii. 1. and in the New Testament, Acts x. 9.) Nor was it the manner of the Hebrews only, but of the Greeks and Romans also, to make the roofs of their houses so that they might walk upon them; and stand there to see any public show, or take the air; as Is. Casaubon shews, in a multitude of instances, lib. iv. in Athenæum, cap. 12. where he observes also out of Pliny and Seneca, that the Roman houses wanted these battlements, which Moses here ordered in this law. By all which we may easily understand those places in the gospel, that speak of proclaiming these things on the house-top, &c. (Matt. x. 27. Luke v. 19.)

That thou bring not blood upon thine house, if any man fall from thence.] And be killed by the fall. For his neglect being the cause of his death, it made him guilty before God of his blood, and liable to be punished by the judges for slighting so profitable an institution as this is: which the Jews extend to a studious care about every thing that might bring a man's life in danger. For example's sake: they might not keep a mad dog, nor set up a broken ladder in their house, &c. as L'Empereur observes upon Bavakama, cap. 5.

Ver. 9. Thou shalt not sow thy vineyard with divers

seeds.] What he had said concerning their fields, Lev. xix. 19. he now says of their vineyards, which they were not to sow with seeds of a diverse kind: for this was an idolatrous custom, as the reason given against it plainly shews. This Maimonides saith he found in a book of the Zabii, and in one rabbi Josiah, who taught, that "these three things, wheat, barley, and grapes dried in the sun, should be sown together in the ground with one and the same cast of the hand:" which was so senseless a thing, that he could not but think they learnt it from the ways of the Amorites, as his words are, that is, from the wicked idolaters of the country to which the Israelites were going. For wheat being sown properly at one season of the year, and barley at another, and a vineyard being an improper place for the growth of either of them, this custom could not have its original either from God or from man, but from the devil, the author of confusion, who taught them this uncouth rite, in honour of Ceres, perhaps, and Bacchus, whom they joined in the same act of worship.

Lest the fruit of thy seed which thou hast sown, and the fruit of thy vineyard, be defiled.] If the Israelites had followed this custom, it would have made both the corn and the grapes that sprung up from such seed impure, because polluted by idolatry; the very smell of which God would not have to remain among the Israelites, as Maimonides speaks in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 37. (See Dr. Spencer, in his very learned work de Leg. Ritual. Hebr. lib. ii. cap. 18.) Every one also knows, that it was unlawful for the Israelites to eat any of the fruits of the earth, till the first-fruits of them had been offered unto God; which would not have been accepted by him of such things as these, that were expressly forbidden by his law; and consequently the whole crop became unclean to them, and might not be used by them.

Ver. 10. Thou shalt not plough with an ox and an ass together.] Lest that law should be violated which we read Lev. xix. 19. "Thou shalt not let thy cattle gender with a diverse kind." So some give the reason of it; even Maimonides, in the book forementioned, par. iii. cap. 49. But it seems also to have respect to those magical rites of the idolatrous nations in those countries; who thought their fields would be more fruitful, if, according to some directions which had been given by their gods, they were thus ploughed. For one cannot well think that men, of themselves, would join together two creatures so different in their temper and motions, to draw in the same yoke, if they had not been led to it by some superstition or other. For their strength is unequal, as Aben Ezra here observes, "the strength of an ass is not as the strength of an ox." Whence it was that Ulysses, to make it be believed that he was mad, joined a horse and an ass to plough: and Homer, Odyss. 5. would have oxen ἰσοφόρους, joined together; that is, ἴσως φέροντας καὶ ἕλκοντας, equally bearing and drawing, as Bochart observes the scholiast there glosses.

The Jews commonly think this law extends to all other creatures of different species, which might not be yoked together. But some understand it so, that they might join several kinds together; provided one was not unclean, and the other clean. Baal-Hatturim finds this mystery in this prohibition, That the righteous ought to have no society with the wicked. And there are those who think the apostle alludes to this, when he saith, (2 Cor. vi. 14.) Μὴ γίνεσθε ἑτεροζυγοῦντες ἀπίστοις, Be not unequally yoked together with unbelievers; which Bochart himself thinks not improbable. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 13. and cap. 40. p. 401. where there are other reasons of this precept.)

Ver. 11. Thou shalt not wear a garment of divers sorts, as of woollen and linen together.] The ancients think God intended hereby to teach his people simplicity in their manners. (See Bochart, in the same book, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 45. p. 491.) But there was something farther in it, as I have observed upon Lev. xix. 19. to which I refer the reader. And shall only add here, that the Jews carried this so far, as not to sew a woollen garment with linen thread; nor on the contrary.

Ver. 12. Thou shalt make thee fringes.] What these were, is sufficiently explained upon Numb. xv. 38, 39. (See there.)

Upon the four quarters of thy vesture.] They wore long garments in those countries, as most people do still at this day. And I suppose the garments of the Jews had usually four skirts: but perchance they sometimes had more or fewer than four; and, in this case, if they had but three, their doctors have resolved they were not bound to make any fringes for them; but, if they had five or six, they were bound to annex them to the four most remote quarters, in which the intermediate were included. But this is a very unreasonable subtilty; the intention of the law being, that they might be put in remembrance of God's commandments by these fringes, which therefore were to be worn in the skirts of their garments, though they had been divided into no wings or quarters at all.

Wherewith thou coverest thyself.] Which they commonly wore: and it seems to signify the uppermost garment, which covered all the rest, and was most seen; whereby they were distinguished from the people of other nations: for that was one end of these fringes, to be a distinctive mark that they were of the Jewish religion. And therefore I do not see any reason in the determination of their doctors, who say, women-servants and little children were not bound to wear fringes: for though little children could not think of the commandments of God, yet it was fit they should wear the note of their religion. There is no reason neither in their resolution, when they say, that if women and servants (who were bound as much as others to observe the laws of God) would wear fringes, though they were not obliged by their constitutions, yet they might not put them on with the common form of benediction which they used. But I think they observe rightly enough, that these fringes were so peculiar to the Jews, that the Samaritans, though acquainted with the law, did not wear them. Nor do the Jews themselves at this day use them upon their upper garment: for that being no longer four-cornered (because it made them a laughing-stock), they wear only under their other garments a kind of square frock, with the aforesaid tassels or pendants fastened to it; (as Leo Modena relates in his History of the Jews, par. i. chap. 5.) Only in their synagogues or schools, at morning prayer, every man puts over his head a square woollen garment, with the tassels fastened at each corner, which they call talith. Concerning which Bartoloccius, in his late Rabbinical Lexicon, tom. i. hath a long dissertation, p. 576, &c.

Ver. 13. If a man take a wife, and go in unto her.] Have carnal knowledge of her.

Digitized by Microsoft®

And hate her.] Do not like her; but is desirous to be rid of her.

Ver. 14. And give occasion of speech against her.] The LXX. translate it ἐπιθῇ αὐτῇ προφαστικοὺς λόγους, lay to her charge such things (for so words sometimes signify) as are opprobrious.

And bring up an evil name upon her.] Or, as the Hebrew words are, bring forth a name of evil, or infamy: which signifies, as Mr. Selden observes, (lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 1. p. 321.) the action itself, which he brought against her in the court of judgment. This appears from the words following.

And say, I took this woman, and when I came to her, I found her not a maid.] This was the form wherein the action was laid against her (as the same Selden there observes), in these words, as the Jews say; "Having lain with this young woman, not of full age, as her husband, I found not in her the tokens of virginity; and making inquisition into the matter, it appears to me that she hath been guilty of adultery, after I had espoused her: and these are eye-witnesses of her guilt."

Ver. 15. Then shall the father and the mother of the damsel take and bring forth the tokens of the damsel's virginity.] If the accusation, as they say, was to be made good by witnesses of her adultery, then her defence was to be made, no doubt, by contrary witnesses, who endeavoured to disprove the testimony which was brought against her. For so they are constrained to interpret the words we translate tokens of her virginity; as I shall shew upon ver. 17. The Hebrews have many nice subtilties about the word damsel, with which I shall not trouble the reader. (See Selden, in the forenamed place, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 1.)

Unto the elders of the city.] The court consisting of twenty-three judges; who had the cognizance of common, capital, and penal causes, in every city.

In the gate.] Where the court sat, as I observed before upon xvi. 18. And this may be added to what I noted there, that by this may be explained those words in the book of Job, v. 4. concerning the children of the wicked, that they are crushed in the gate, i. e. lose their cause, and are condemned in the court of judgment, and those of the wise man, Prov. xxii. 22. Oppress not the afflicted in the gate, i. e. do him justice, and not let him be overthrown, because he wants money to defend his cause. This appears to be the sense from the very next words, (ver. 23.) For the Lord will plead their cause, &c.

Ver. 16. And the damsel's father shall say unto the elders, I gave my daughter unto this man to wife.] The Jews say, the mother had no power to espouse her daughter, but the father only, before she was of age. Mischna Sotæ, cap. 3. sect. 8. where Wagenseil notes, that the mother, and brethren also, had some power in this matter; but such, that the daughter, within a time limited, might make the contract void.

And he hateth her.] Hath no affection which a husband ought to have to a wife. If she had no parents alive, the judges appointed her a guardian: and Josephus saith the next of kin were to patronize her, as if they had been her parents.

Ver. 17. And, lo! he hath given occasion of speech against her.] See ver. 14. He doth not add what there follows, and brought up an evil name upon her (i. e. accused her publicly before you of adultery), because it is sufficiently comprehended in this.

Saying, I found not thy daughter a maid.] As such and such give evidence.

And yet these are the tokens of my daughter's virginity.] I have good witnesses to the contrary; which are here ready to be produced before the court, to disprove the former testimony.

And they.] That is, the witnesses which the father produces.

Shall spread the cloth before the elders of the city.] Though such tokens of virginity, as are commonly understood by these words, might always be found in those countries (being very consonant to the opinion of the chiefest Arabian physicians, as Mr. Selden observes out of Avicenna, and of the Africans and other people at this day, as many authors testify, see Joh. Geusius de Victimis Humanis, par. i. cap. 9. and par. ii. cap. 2. and Wierus L. Medicarum Observationem, sect. de Hymene), especially in such virgins as the Jews say were here meant, who were under thirteen years of age; and though all that some physicians and lawyers in these parts of the world have said to the contrary is of no consideration; yet there are weighty reasons to incline us to think, that no man of common sense would bring such an action against his wife, wherein he was sure to be cast, whether his cause was right or wrong, if these were the evidences whereby it was to be tried. For if he accused her falsely, he knew her friends were able to produce the sheet wherein they lay when they were married, with such tokens upon it as would disprove him, and render him guilty of defamation. And if he had a just ground to accuse her, because he knew they could produce no such tokens; yet this was no proof she had been vitiated since she was espoused to him: for she might have been corrupted before; and then he could not attain his end, which was to be rid of her, not by way of divorce (for then he must have given her a dowry, which he was desirous to save), but by having her put to death as an adultress, which ver. 21. shews to be the present case. Such evident reasons as these have constrained the Jews to understand these words, not according to the very letter of them, but figuratively, of such witnesses produced by her parents, as convinced the other of falsity so evidently, that they made it appear as plainly as a piece of cloth that is unfolded, and laid before men's eyes to view it. And they think the Hebrew word simlah, which we translate the cloth, favours this exposition: for it never signifies a sheet, or linen-cloth, (which is wont to be called sadin, Judg. xiv. 12. Prov. xxxi. 24.) but such cloth as men's garments are made of, which commonly is woollen, not linen. And so it is used in this book, Deut. x. 18. and in this very chapter, ver. 5. So that the sense is, They shall produce evident proofs, and lay them before the court, like a piece of cloth, which is spread for all that please to look upon it. Whether this be the truth or not, I will not dispute, but refer the reader to Mr. Selden, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 1, 2.

Ver. 18. And the elders of that city shall take that man.] If they were convinced that he had accused his wife falsely, he was to be delivered into the hands of the officers who executed the sentence of the court.

And chastise him.] Condemn him to receive forty stripes save one, as both Josephus and the Talmudists agree; and it was to be done with a scourge made of thongs of an ox's hide. The woman was dismissed with a solemn benediction; the form of which is set down in the Jewish rituals: and as for the false witnesses against her, they were condemned to be stoned, according to the law, chap. xix. 18, 19.

Ver. 19. And they shall amerce him in a hundred shekels of silver, and give them unto the father of the damsel.] Who was to receive this satisfaction for the reproach which was thrown upon his family. It is something strange that Josephus should mention only πεντήκοντα σίκλους, fifty shekels to be paid to her father, when the Scripture expressly saith a hundred, (lib. iv. Archæolog. cap. 8.) But it is supposed, by some, that he means fifty besides her dowry, which he was to have given her, if he had put her away: which, that he might save, he designed to take away her life; and therefore was punished double to what it would have cost him, if he had been so wicked.

Because he hath brought up an evil report upon a virgin of Israel.] Laid the most infamous crime to the charge of an innocent virgin; and that out of hatred to her and love to his money. For if he would have put her away, according to the law of divorce, no man could have hindered him, as Maimonides observes: but then he must have paid her fifty shekels, which they take to be the dowry of virgins, mentioned Exod. xxii. 16, 17. To keep which to himself, and be rid of her, he brought this scandalous action against her; for which he was thus justly punished.

And she shall be his wife: he may not put her away all his days.] Besides the two former punishments, in his body and his purse, he was deprived of the common benefit which all men had who did not like their wives; which was to sue out a divorce. Here Maimonides calls upon his readers to admire the wise ordination of God, which appears in his judgments, as well as in his works. For because this man took away his wife's reputation, therefore God ordered him to be rendered vile, by being whipped: and because he basely contrived to save her dowry of fifty shekels, he ordered him to be amerced as much more: and because he indulged his lust, and sought nothing but his pleasure, therefore he was bound to keep her as long as she lived, (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 49.)

Ver. 20. But if this thing be true, and the tokens of virginity be not found for the damsel.] If the witnesses which appeared for her could not prove the falsity of their testimony who appeared against her.

Ver. 21. Then shall they bring out the damsel to the door of her father's house.] Where she was to be punished, as a disgrace to her parents, who had taken no better care to preserve her chastity while she lived with them.

And the men of her city shall stone her with stones, that she die.] This was the punishment of such adulteresses, except only of a priest's daughter, who, if she was guilty of this crime, was burnt alive, (Lev. xxi. 19.) And it plainly shews he speaks here of a woman corrupted between the time of her espousals and her husband's completing the marriage: otherwise he could not have had this capital action against her, none being put to death for simple fornication. And this Maimonides saith, in Seder Zeraim, that, from Moses to his time, it was never doubted, the woman he here speaks of was one that proved false to her husband after she was contracted to him.

Because she hath wrought folly in Israel.] A great wickedness; as the word folly signifies in Scripture, and as the Vulgar translates it.

To play the whore in her father's house.] Where she remained after her espousals, as in a safe place, till her husband brought her home to his own house.

So shalt thou put evil away from among you.] See chap. xix. 19.

Ver. 22. If a man be found lying with a woman married to a husband, then they shall both of them die, &c.] It is not said what death, either here, or Lev. xx. 10. But the Jews say they were to be strangled: which is an opinion so settled among them, that Buxtorf saith he never saw any Hebrew book which assigned any other punishment for adultery but this. Stoning, indeed, was the punishment of her that, after her espousals, played the whore (as was noted before) between that time and her marriage: but after the marriage was completed, if she were guilty of this crime, this was the only punishment, according to their tradition. (See upon Lev. xx. 10. and Buxtorf. de Sponsal. et Divortiis, p. 32, 33. and Grotius, in John viii. 5.)

Ver. 23. If a damsel, that is a virgin, be betrothed to a husband.] But not yet known by him: for there was generally some space between the espousals and the bringing her home to her husband's house. And the time allowed was, more or less, according to her age. (See Selden, lib. ii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 8.)

And a man find her in the city, and lie with her.] If he lay with her any where else, the crime was the same; but it was not so easy to corrupt her in her father's house, or among her friends, where she remained till the completion of the marriage, as it was to do it abroad in the city, or in the field.

Ver. 24. Then ye shall bring them both out unto the gate of that city.] That is, to the court of judgment, which sat there; as I noted upon xvi. 18.

And ye shall stone them with stones, that they die.] After they had been sentenced to this death by the court.

The damsel, because she cried not out.] Which was a demonstration she was not forced, but lay with him by consent.

Being in the city.] Where the neighbours might have heard her cry; and the force, if there had been any, prevented.

The man, because he hath humbled his neighbour's wife.] For so she was by such a contract, as made her only his. This is supposed to be the case of the woman taken in adultery, mentioned John viii. 5. (See my notes upon Lev. xx. 10.)

So thou shalt put away evil from among you.] See ver. 21, 22.

Ver. 25. And if a man find a betrothed damsel in the field.] Where nobody was near, as in the city.

And the man force her, and lie with her.] It was presumed, by the circumstances of the place, that she did not consent, but was under a force; as she also affirmed, and he could not prove the contrary.

Then the man only that lay with her shall die.] Because he only was guilty of a crime, as it follows in the next words.

Ver. 26. But unto the damsel thou shalt do nothing; there is in the damsel no sin worthy of death.] To make her liable to suffer death: for it was her misfortune, as we speak, not her fault, that she was ravished.

For as when a man riseth against his neighbour, and slayeth him.] He not being able to defend himself.

Even so is this matter.] It is here observed by many (particularly by Grotius and De Dieu), that chastity is equal unto life.

Ver. 27. For he found her in the field.] Far distant from all company.

And the betrothed damsel cried.] For help, as she affirmed, and as it was presumed; because, if she had consented, some other place might have been found, more convenient for their purpose than the field.

And there was none to save her.] None appeared to rescue her, as she desired.

Ver. 28. If a man find a virgin.] In the field, beforementioned.

Which is not betrothed.] To a husband.

And lay hold of her, and lie with her, and they be found.] There be witnesses of it; or they themselves confess it. This case is different from that in Exod. xxii. 16, 17. in many respects. For that law speaks of one that was drawn in to consent to the man's lying with her by enticing words (which is expressly there mentioned), and fair promises, perhaps, of marriage; but here Moses speaks of one that laid hold of her, i. e. deflowered her by force and violence. In this case the man was bound to marry her, if she and her father pleased (for both their consents were required, though the man that deflowered her could not refuse); but in the former case the man himself might choose whether he would marry or not, which he could not refuse in this; and besides, was bound to pay fifty shekels, as a mulct upon him for the crime, as follows in the next verse. (See Selden, lib. i. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 16.)

Ver. 29. Then the man that lay with her shall give unto the damsel's father fifty shekels of silver.] Here is another difference between this case and that in Exodus; where the man was bound to settle a dowry upon her; but here to pay a fine unto her father. The reason is plain; because there was no need of settling a dowry in this case, as in the former; for the dowry was settled upon her in that case, lest the husband might lightly and wantonly put her away by divorce, and she have nothing to maintain her; of which there was no danger here, because this law saith expressly, in the conclusion of this verse, that he may not put her away all his days. Yet there are those who think it likely, that in this case also he settled a dowry of fifty shekels upon her, besides what he paid to her father; for otherwise the condition of a virgin deflowered by force, was worse than hers deflowered by her own consent.

They have some exceptions concerning this payment to her father, which are not very material, nor certain. But this is considerable, that this fine was the same, whether the woman was of noble or of mean parentage, neither more nor less was paid by the law. But in aftertimes, the Sanhedrin, they tell us, added some other mulcts besides this here mentioned; because it seemed so small, that the honour of a virgin was not thought sufficiently repaired by it. Therefore, he that enticed a virgin paid other two; one for the shame and dishonour he had done her; and the other for the loss of her virginity, and vitiating her body. And he that forced a virgin paid a third besides these two, upon the account of the pain unto which he was supposed to have put her. And in these three they proportioned the penalties to the quality of the person, and other considerations, which made them vary. (See Selden, in the forenamed place, p. 123.)

And she shall be his wife, because he hath humbled her.] Though she were blind, or lame, or leprous, he could not refuse her, if she and her father required him to marry her.

He may not put her away all his days.] This was a third part of his punishment for the force he had committed, that he should be forced not only to take her to wife, but constrained also to keep her as long as she lived, and not have the liberty of giving her a bill of divorce, as other men might do, who were desirous to part with their wives.

If it be asked, how it could be known whether she was enticed or forced; they answer, as was observed before, that it was reasonably presumed that he forced her, if the thing was done in the field, or in a place far from inhabitants; but if in the city or town, that she consented, unless the contrary was evidently proved.

Ver. 30. A man shall not take his father's wife.] That is, shall not marry her.

Nor discover his father's skirt.] Nor so much as lie with her. For this is a modest phrase, borrowed from the ancient custom in those countries; where the bridegroom, when he brought his bride into the chuppa, as they called it, or bridal chamber, spread the skirt of his robe over her, to signify his right to her, and power over her, and that he alone might lawfully enjoy her. (Ruth iii. 9. Ezek. xvi. 8.)

And this verse seems to me to be here inserted as a short memorandum, that they should be careful to observe all the laws which he had delivered against incestuous marriages in the eighteenth chapter of Leviticus. (See there, ver. 8. and xx. 11.)

CHAP. XXIII.

Ver. 1. He that is wounded in the stones.] Bruised or compressed in those parts; as the manner was of making eunuchs, who are here spoken of, and were sometimes made that way when they were infants; or by taking them quite away; which was done in some when they were grown up. And there were those who had none of these parts left remaining; as it follows in the next words.

Or hath his privy member cut off.] In whole, or in part; which was not used till they found the other did not effectually answer their purpose in this unnatural practice. Wherein some thought they honoured their gods, particularly Cybele, the mother of the gods, unto whose service her priests devoted themselves by cutting off their genitals. So not only Minucius Felix, Tertullian, and several other of the ancient Christian writers testify, but many also of the pagan. (See Joh. Geusius de Victimis Humanis, par. ii. cap. 1.)

Shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord.] These persons were so much abhorred by some among the pagans, that Lucian saith they were excluded not only from the schools of philosophers, but, which was more, ἀπὸ τῶν ἱερῶν αὐτῶν, καὶ περιῤῥαντηρίων, καὶ τῶν κοινῶν ἁπάντων συλλόγων, from their holy offices, and their sprinklings, and all common meetings. So Diocles is introduced speaking in his Eunuchus. But nobody thinks this to be the meaning here, that they should not entertain such a person as a proselyte; or that he should not come to worship God at the temple: for that was free for all nations if they renounced idolatry. But the meaning of this law is, either to forbid the Israelites to marry with such persons, or not to admit them to bear any office in the Jewish commonwealth. The Hebrew doctors generally take it in the first sense. See Selden, de Jure Nat. et Gent. lib. v. cap. 16. and so do a great many among Christian writers. And there is an eminent example of the use of this phrase in this sense, Neh. xiii. 1—3. But some think it was superfluous to forbid this, because none would marry with such persons as were incapable to perform the marriage duty; and therefore they follow the second sense, it being certain that the Hebrew word kahal, congregation, signifies, in many places, not the whole body of the people of Israel, but the great assembly of elders, into which no such person was to be admitted; because they were unfit for government, eunuchs being observed generally to want courage. Thus Simeon de Muis, and others, who seem to have great reason on their side. Yet it is so plain that the congregation of the Lord, in the following part of this chapter, signifies the people of Israel, who might not marry with the persons mentioned, ver. 2, 3. 8. that I cannot but think it ought to be so interpreted here. For though such marriages were useless and unprofitable, as Maimonides speaks, yet they made a distinction between those who were made eunuchs by God (that is, born so) and those made by men: and this law, they say, is not to be understood of the former, but only of the latter. Some of which, it is certain, were left in such a condition, that they were desirous of marriage, as appears by the constitution of the Emperor Leo, who did not think it superfluous to forbid marriage with them. For it appears by it, that some women choose such husbands. See also Ecclesiasticus xxx. 20. but especially the book ascribed to St. Basil, De Vera Virginitate, tom. i. p. 719, &c. where there is too free a description of the unextinguishable lust of such eunuchs as were only deprived τῶν διδύμων, whose company he charges virgins to avoid, not only because they hoped to corrupt them without danger of discovery, but were insatiable in their desires. And on the other side, though they were unfit for marriage, yet it appears by many instances in history, that they were not unfit for government, nor wanted courage for the greatest undertakings. I need only refer the reader for this to Xenophon's Cyropædia, lib. vii.

They that follow allegorical senses, free themselves from all these difficulties. (See Filesacus, lib. i. Selectorum, p. 169. 185.) But one cannot think that Moses intended any of those things; though such pious use may be made of his words.

Ver. 2. A bastard.] The Hebrews do not understand by the word mamzer, one that was begotten in simple fornication, out of the state of marriage; but one that was begotten of such persons as the law forbade them to marry, or lie withal, under pain of being cut off; viz. those mentioned in the eighteenth of Leviticus. They only except this single case, if a man lay with a menstruous woman, and begat a child of her at that time, it was not a mamzer. See Selden, lib. de Succession. in Bona Defunct, cap. 3. and lib. v. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 16. and Wagenseil lately, in his very learned Annotation upon Mischna Sotæ, cap. 4. sect. 1. where he observes, out of a MS. which he calls very precious (Etz-Hachajim in Hilcoth Nidda), that mamzer, whether male or female, was excluded from the congregation of the Lord. And they were mamzers who were born of any woman whom the law prohibited them to have knowledge of; whether it was by violence or by consent, by error or advisedly, it made no difference.

Shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord.] Nor marry with an Israelite. So all the doctors, none excepted, expound it, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. de Successione in Pontific. cap. 2. p. 209. If any man of Israel married such a woman, or any woman of Israel married such a man, and they were found in bed together after espousals, they were both whipped, for violating this precept. But if they lay together without any espousals, this punishment was not inflicted on them.

Even unto the tenth generation shall he not enter into the congregation of the Lord.] That is, never, as the Hebrew doctors expound it. And Maimonides (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 49.) gives this reason for it, that people might be deterred from such marriages or conjunctions, which would leave an indelible blot upon their posterity. And, indeed, some heathens anciently put such a mark of infamy upon mere bastards, as to prohibit both males and females to come to their sacred offices. Such a law there was at Athens, mentioned by Isæus; as Casaubon observes upon Athenæus, lib. vi. cap. 6. p. 410.

There were some also of these mamzers, who were not manifestly born of such incestuous, or other forbidden mixtures, but were called dubious, because their fathers were not known, or being exposed, and found in the fields, or the streets, neither father nor mother was known. Yet it being uncertain whence they were descended, the Israelites might not marry with them, for fear they should be polluted by those who, perhaps, were born of incestuous parents. But proselytes of justice, they say, might marry with mamzers; and, that they might not for ever be excluded from the congregation of the Lord, they contrived this remedy for the restitution of their blood. They might marry a slave (who was baptized and become a Jew), whose children were not reputed mamzers, but only slaves: who, being made Jews, and having their freedom given them, might lawfully marry with a Jewish woman; and then they were entirely incorporated into the congregation of the Lord: for proles sequitur matrem, the issue follows the mother, (as that MS. of Wagenseil hath it, p. 565.) and there was no regard had to the father.

Ver. 3. An Ammonite or a Moabite shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord, even to the tenth generation shall they not enter for ever.] These last words for ever, in this verse, the Jews think warrant them to interpret those words to the tenth generation, in the foregoing verse, as if he said, never. It is certain, indeed, that Moses intended to exclude the Moabites and Ammonites from marrying with the Jews for ever; for so Nehemiah understood him when he quoted this law, xiii. 1. as a reason against the Israelites' marriages with them in his time, when more than ten generations were past. But then these words, for ever, being omitted in the foregoing verse, where he speaks of mamzers, it seems reasonable that they should not be so interpreted; but that, after ten generations were past, all distinction between them and others should be abolished. This, one would have expected, should have been the sense of those who examine every word so nicely as the Jews do: for here being mention made only of an Ammonite and Moabite, that is, of the males of these two nations, they will not have their women concerned in this law: but say, that an Israelite might take one of them to wife, if she embraced their religion. For thus they expound this whole matter of marriages with proselytes of justice; that is, such of other nations as became entirely of the Jews' religion. With such proselytes of some nations, whether men or women, the Israelites were never to make any marriages: with those of some other nations, they were prohibited only to marry with their men: with others, they were prohibited to marry only for some generations; and there were others, with whom they might marry as soon as they were made perfect proselytes. Of the first kind were the seven nations of Canaan, mentioned Deut. vii. 1. with the males or females of which they might never contract an affinity. To the second kind belong the Ammonites and Moabites; to whose males an Israelitish woman was forbid by this precept to marry: but a man of Israel might marry any of their women, after they professed the Jewish religion; otherwise David, who descended from Ruth, a Moabitess, had been illegitimate. Of the third kind were the Edomites and Egyptians; with whom, and with their children, the Israelites might not marry; but their grandchildren might. And of the fourth kind were all other nations besides these mentioned. This is an abridgment of what our great Selden hath more largely shewn to be the sense of the Jews, in his fifth book de Jure Nat. et Gent. &c. cap. 14. which another excellent person, J. Christoph. Wagenseil hath confirmed, out of his inestimable MS. as he calls Etz-Hachajim, in Hilcoth Nidda, cap. 10. (See Excerp. Gem. in Sota, cap. 1. p. 143.)

Ver. 4. Because they met you not with bread and water, when ye came forth out of Egypt.] This seems to belong to the Ammonites, who had no compassion towards the Israelites when they were distressed in the wilderness: but, though they were near of kin to them, did not shew them that civility which is commonly expressed to mere strangers in their travels, (Gen. xiv. 18. xviii. 2. 31. xix. 1, 2.) We do not find any mention of this barbarity of theirs in the foregoing history; but we read how kind God ordered the Israelites to be to them, in not meddling with them, much less distressing them, as they passed by their country, (Deut. ii. 19.) Which aggravated their inhumanity in not vouchsafing this common kindness to the Israelites, of giving them the refreshment of bread and water as they went by them.

And because they hired against thee Balaam the son of Beor, of Pethor of Mesopotamia, to curse thee.] As the foregoing passage peculiarly refers to the Ammonites, so this doth to the Moabites; who, with the assistance of the Midianites, invited Balaam, by the promises of a great reward, to come from the eastern country and curse the Israelites. (See Numb. xxii. 5—7.) For these two reasons God laid this prohibition upon his people; in which Maimonides observes the Divine justice in proportioning punishments to offences. For Amalek coming out against the Israelites, when they were newly come forth from Egypt, to cut them off with the sword, God commanded their memory to be blotted out, (xxv. 19.) but the Ammonites being only basely covetous, and the Moabites acting against them only by craft, and not by force, God inflicted no other punishment upon them but this, that his people should avoid all affinity with them, and shew no love to them, (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 41.) And the MS. author of Etz-Hachajim, mentioned by Wagensell, in the place forenamed, makes this the ground of the distinction mentioned before between the males and females of those countries: "Their males (saith he) might never marry with an Israelitish woman; but, by a tradition delivered down to us from Moses in Mount Sinai, we hold, that the women of those countries (if they embraced the Jewish religion) might be married to a man of Israel. For the women must be thought, in all reason, not to have been guilty, as the men were, of that which was the reason of this law; it not being the custom for women to bring out bread and water to travellers; nor did they send ambassadors to hire Balaam to come and curse the Israelites." Accordingly we find Ruth, who was a Moabitess, married to Boaz, the ancestor of David.

Ver. 5. Nevertheless the Lord thy God would not hearken unto Balaam; but the Lord thy God turned the curse into a blessing unto thee, because the Lord thy God loved thee.] Balaam, indeed, did not curse the Israelites as the Moabites desired, and he intended; but no thanks were owing to him for that: but it was to be ascribed to the love of God to his people, who constrained him, against his will, to bless them.

Ver. 6. Thou shalt not seek their peace nor their prosperity all thy days for ever.] By entering into any league with them, much less by taking them into conjugal society: but, on the contrary, they were to look upon them as dangerous enemies; who, being near their neighbours, would watch all opportunities to ensnare or disturb them.

Some of the Jews would have this to be an exception to the general rule, xx. 10. that they might not offer them terms of peace, as they were bound to do to all men, but the seven nations of Canaan: though, if they desired peace, they were bound, they say, to grant it. (See Schickard, in his Mischpat Hammelech, p. 118.) But Grotius hath well observed, upon Matt. v. 43. that God did not give the Jews any right to their country, (as appears from Deut. ii. 19.) and therefore the meaning here is, that they should not make any league with them of mutual assistance, which they called fœdera, συμμαχίας.

Ver. 7. Thou shalt not abhor an Edomite.] So as never to enter into the society of marriage with them, they being a circumcised people.

For he is thy brother.] Nearer of kin to them than the Ammonites and Moabites; Esau their father being the twin-brother of Jacob. And so Moses calls them, when he delivers God's command to the Israelites not to meddle with them, Deut. ii. 8. "We passed by from our brethren the children of Esau," &c. Here it may be observed, that the word brother comprehended more than the Israelites, as our Saviour shews the word neighbour did, Luke x. 29, &c.

Thou shalt not abhor an Egyptian, because thou wast a stranger in his land.] That is, the Egyptians in a sore famine sustained them, their children, flocks, and herds, very kindly; the memory of which benefit God would not have forgotten, though in future generations they were cruelly oppressed by them.

Ver. 8. The children that are begotten of them shall enter into the congregation of the Lord in the third generation.] When they had been proselytes for three generations, it was lawful to marry with them. Nay, some of the Jews are so liberal here of their kindness, as to understand by banim, not children in general, but sons, with whom only marriage is forbidden till the third generation; marriage with their daughters being lawful, as they think, as soon as they turned complete proselytes. Upon which account Solomon took Pharaoh's daughter to wife. See Selden, lib. v. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 14, 15. where he observes, that all this held good only till the captivity of Babylon, when, all these nations being confused, they might marry with any of them if they became Jews. For wars, and colonies, and deportations, had made such a mixture of people, that one could not be known from another. This Wagenseil hath lately confirmed out of several Hebrew authors, whom Mr. Selden did not trouble himself to mention; and particularly out of the MS. Etz-Hachajim, which he most highly commends. (See p. 149. upon Sota.) They all agree, likewise, that none of these laws extended to proselytes, who might marry with any of these nations. (See Selden, ib. cap. 18.)

Ver. 9. When the host goeth forth against thine enemy, then keep thee from every wicked thing.] This was a rule to be observed at all times; but then especially, when they had the greatest need of the Divine help (for which wicked people could not reasonably hope), and when there was the greatest danger of being wicked, in a time of such licence as soldiers commonly take. There is a sentence very like this in Agathias, lib. ii. (mentioned by Grotius towards the conclusion of his Prolegomena to the book de Jure Belli et Pacis), Ἀδικία γὰρ καὶ Θεοῦ ἀθεραπευσία φευκτὰ μὲν ἀεὶ καὶ ἀσύμφορα, μάλιστα δὲ ἐν τῷ προπολεμεῖν καὶ παρατάττεσθαι. Injustice and neglect of God's service are ever to be avoided as most pernicious; but especially in a time of war, and when men are upon the point of giving battle. Which he proves elsewhere, by the illustrious examples of Darius, Xerxes, and the Athenians in Sicily.

Ver. 10. If there be among you any man that is not clean, by reason of uncleanness that chanceth to him by night.] This seems to be only one instance of uncleanness, from which they were to keep themselves carefully; though it was no moral impurity, nor a voluntary pollution. By which it was easy for them to understand how watchful they were to be over themselves, in all other cases, especially such as had an inward turpitude in them.

Then he shall go abroad out of the camp.] There is no such thing required before in Lev. xv. 16. where the same pollution is mentioned. The reason, I suppose, was, that he speaks there of what happened to them in their own houses; where they had private chambers, into which they might retire, and keep themselves from defiling others: but here, of those that were abroad in the army, where it was hard to keep their fellow-soldiers from touching them, without removing out of the camp.

He shall not come within the camp.] This some understand, particularly Drusius, of not coming within the camp of God, and of the Levites, that is, to the tabernacle: but it seems to be an exclusion of him from the whole camp of Israel, as I have expounded it.

Ver. 11. But it shall be, when evening cometh on, he shall wash himself with water; and when the sun is down he shall come into the camp again.] See Lev. xv. 16. The end of all this, as Maimonides observes, More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 61. was, that every man might have this fixed in his mind, that their camp ought to be as the sanctuary of God (into which every one knows no man might enter in his uncleanness), and not like the camps of the gentiles, in which all manner of corruption, filthiness, rapines, thefts, and other wickednesses, were freely committed.

Ver. 12. Thou shalt have a place also without the camp, whither thou shalt go forth abroad.] A place distant from all company; where they might ease themselves, as it is explained in the next verse. For natural modesty directed all men on such occasions to seek privacy; and it tended, as all cleanliness doth, to the preservation of health: which was one reason of ordering them to find a place without the camp, that there might be no offensive smell among them. And hereby, as Maimonides observes, they were distinguished from brute beasts, which commonly ease themselves any where, and before any body. But, besides all this, Moses himself gives us the principal reason of this command, peculiarly respecting the Israelites, (ver. 14.)

Ver. 13. Thou shalt have a paddle.] An instrument wherewith to dig up the ground, and cover it again; Epiphanius, Hæres. lxxvii. calls it πάσσαλον σιδηροῦν, an iron paddle.

Upon thy weapon.] Their sword, I suppose.

And it shall be, when thou wilt ease thyself abroad.] It was not in their choice when they would do this, but when their needs required: yet the Jews will have it, that they were to accustom themselves to do this business in the morning, as soon as they were up. Thus the Jews at this day, (as Leo Modena tells us, in his history of them, par. i. chap. 6.) afterward washing their hands, that they may go clean to their prayers.

Thou shalt dig therewith.] A hole in the ground.

And shalt turn back, and cover that which cometh from thee.] That there might be no appearance nor scent of it remaining. This is still practised by the Caribbeans; among whom there is never any such thing as ordure seen. So the authors of the History of the Caribbee Islands tell us, book ii. chap. 14. where they observe, also, out of Busbequius, that the Turks use the same cleanliness in their camps, making a hole with a piece of iron, wherein they bury their excrements. And in this matter the Essenes were extremely superstitious; for, as Josephus relates, they would not ease themselves at all on the sabbath-day, because they looked upon it as a labour to dig in the earth, and excrements not fit to be seen on that day.

Ver. 14. For the Lord thy God walketh in the midst of thy camp.] At this time the ark, which was the token of the Divine presence, was settled in the midst of their camp; and, whithersoever they moved, was carried along with them: two standards going before, and two following, and the ark between them in the midst, as appears from the tenth of Numbers. It is likely, also, that it was carried in aftertimes in the midst of them, when they went to war; as some think it was when they went against the Midianites, (Numb. xxxi. 6.) and when they encompassed Jericho. Now this presence of God among them was the reason why no uncleanness, though in itself natural, might be found in their camp; but, out of reverence to the Divine Majesty, which dwelt between the cherubims over the ark, be removed afar off. And by such actions as these, Maimonides well observes, God intended to strengthen and confirm the faith of the soldiers, that God, dwelling among them, would go along with them, and fight for them against their enemies, as it here follows, More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 41. And thus Abarbinel discourses upon these words: "The camps of the Israelites ought to be holy, having a special providence of God among them: for they do not make war by mere human power and courage, but by the power of God and of his Spirit, on which they depend for deliverance from all evil, and victory over their enemies," &c.

To deliver thee, and to give up thine enemies before thee.] This is the constant sense of this phrase, of God's being in the midst of them, to defend, protect, and deliver them from all evil, as I observed before. (See Deut. vii. 21. Josh. iii. 10. Psal. xlvi. 6. Zachar. iii. 15.) Now this cleanliness being commanded with respect to the Divine presence, which dwelt among them, the Jews are strangely mistaken in using such superstitions as they do in every place, when they have no such presence of the Divine Majesty in the midst of them. (See Schickard in Mischpat Hammeloch, cap. 5. Theor. 18. p. 144, &c.)

Therefore shall thy camp be holy.] Free from all manner of defilements, though they be only of this sort.

That he see no unclean thing in thee.] In these words, saith Maimonides (in the place beforenamed), he deters them from fornication; which is far worse than the forementioned uncleanness; but too common among the soldiers, when they are absent from their own homes. And therefore, that he might keep them from such impurities, he commands them such actions (he means covering their ordure) as might call to their minds the glorious majesty of God which dwelt among them. But though the Hebrew word, which we here translate unclean thing, properly signifies nakedness, and all those impure mixtures mentioned in the eighteenth of Leviticus, and therefore by Maimonides particularly applied to such uncleanness; yet Mr. Selden hath well observed, that it signifies all manner of filthiness; and therefore is well so translated by us, both here and in the next chapter, where he speaks of the matter of divorce.

And so it is used by the prophet Nahum, iii. 5. (to name no more), where the nakedness of Nineveh, which God saith he would shew to all nations, signifies all the murders, robberies, deceit, and other great wickednesses, which bounded in that city. (See Uxor. Hebr. lib. iii. cap. 23.) And thus Abarbinel here extends it to all the horrid sins which were usually committed in the camps of idolaters.

And turn away from thee.] As princes are wont to do, when they see any thing offensive to them. And the meaning is, he would not deliver them from their enemies (as he promised before), but give them up into their hands. I conclude all this matter with the words of R. Zacharias, in Pirke Eliezer, cap. 44. "The pillar of the cloud (in which the glory of the Lord dwelt) encompassed the camps of Israel round about, and made them like a city girt about with a wall, that no enemy might assault them. But this cloud threw all uncleanness out of the camps of Israel, for they were holy:" and he quotes this place for it.

Ver. 15. Thou shalt not deliver unto his master the servant which is escaped from his master unto thee.] The Hebrew doctors understand this of a servant of another nation who was become a Jew. Whom his master, if he went to dwell out of Judea, might not carry along with him against his will; and if he fled from him, when he had carried him, he might not be delivered to him, but suffered to dwell in the land of Israel. Which they understand also of a servant that fled from his master out of any of the countries of the gentiles into the land of Israel; which was to be a safe refuge to him. (See Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. juxta Discipl. Hebr. cap. 8. p. 711.)

Ver. 16. He shall dwell with thee, even among you.] Having embraced the Jewish religion.

In the place which he shall choose, in one of thy gates where it liketh him best.] He was not to be abridged of his liberty, but permitted to settle himself where he pleased, in any part of their country.

Thou shalt not oppress him.] For there was an express law against all manner of injuries or hardships put upon strangers, (Lev. xix. 33, 34.)

Ver. 17. There shall be no whore of the daughters of Israel, nor a Sodomite of the sons of Israel.] Or a whoremonger of the sons of Israel; as the last part of the verse may be translated, with the same reason that the foregoing words are translated, no whore of the daughters of Israel. So Bonfrerius truly observes, and so the Vulgar Latin and the LXX. translate it, and several other versions mentioned by Mr. Selden, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 23. p. 487. Which sort of persons Moses would not have to be tolerated among the Israelites, as they were among the Egyptians; many of which, if we may believe Sextus Empiricus, were so far from thinking it a reproach for women to prostitute themselves, that they looked upon it as honourable, and gloried in it, τὸ τὰς γυναῖκας ἑταιρεῖν, &c. παρὰ τοῖς πολλοῖς Αἰγυπτίων εὐκλεὲς, &c. (lib. iii. Pyr. Hypot. cap. 24. p. 152.)

"And great reason there was for this prohibition, because by whoredom families are confounded and destroyed (as Maimonides observes); and their issues are looked upon by all men as aliens; so that none will own them as their kindred, and their neighbours become strangers to them; than which nothing can be worse for them, and for their parents. For which cause (saith he) all public stews were disallowed among the Israelites; who had this benefit by it, among others, that many brawls and quarrels, fightings and bloodshed, were prevented; which frequently happened, when several men were assembled at the same time, contending for the same woman. For so the Scripture saith, Jeremiah v. 7. They assemble by troops in the harlots' houses. For the preventing of these and such-like mischiefs, and that the distinction of families might be preserved, both whores and whoremongers are here condemned; and no other conjunction permitted, but with a man's own wife, publicly married. For if a private marriage had been sufficient, many would have kept women in their houses as their whores, and pretended they were their wives. Therefore, after a man had privately espoused a woman, he was bound publicly to keep his wedding." Thus that great man, More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 49. and see Selden, lib. v. de Jure Nat. et Gent. juxta Disc. Hebr. cap. 4. p. 554.

How much more abominable then were such persons as prostituted their bodies in honour of Venus and of Priapus, and such-like filthy deities! of which sort there were both males and females consecrated to such impure services! and this was practised even in the days of Moses; as appears from the history of those who committed fornication with the daughters of Moab, who exposed themselves in honour of Baal-Peor; for their lying with them was accounted idolatry. And such there were at last among the Israelites, as appears from 1 Kings xiv. 24. 2 Kings xxiii. where we read, that the houses of the Sodomites (as we translate it) were by the house of the Lord. Which shews they were not vulgar, but consecrated Sodomites, or whoremongers. I need not mention the heathen writers, who tell us this was a piece of religion among them. See our learned Dr. Spencer, lib. ii. de Leg. Hebr. Ritual. cap. 22. and Heideggerus, in his Histor. Patriarch, exercit. i. sect. 2. where he observes, a great many very learned men understand this very place, not merely of vulgar whores, but of such as I have mentioned; which were famous in ancient times among the Phœnicians, Babylonians, and other nations, whom Strabo calls ἱεροδούλους, lib. viii. Geograph. where he saith, (p. 378.) that at Corinth there was a temple so richly endowed, that it maintained πλείους ἢ χιλίας ἱεροδούλους ἑταίρας, above a thousand of these consecrated whores: whom both men and women had dedicated to the goddess, Οἱ γὰρ ναύκληροι ῥᾳδίως ἐξαναλίσκονται, for seafaring men (who arrived in great numbers at this port) parted with their money easily. And, lib. xii. speaking of Comana, he saith, there were a multitude of women there, τῶν ἐργαζομένων ἀπὸ σώματος, who maintained themselves by prostituting their bodies; and most of them were ἱεραὶ, sacred persons: this city being a little Corinth, to which great numbers of people resorted at their festivals, διὰ τὸ πλῆθος τῶν ἑταρῶν αἳ τῆς Ἀφροδίτης ἦσαν ἱεραὶ, because of the multitude of harlots which were here sacred to Venus, p. 559. And the like account we find in Athenæus, lib. xiii. Deipnos. cap. 6. where he saith, they that went to pray there, were wont, for the obtaining their petitions, to add, that they would bring some women to be devoted unto Venus; as Xenophon the Corinthian did, when he returned conqueror from the Olympics.

Ver. 18. Thou shalt not bring the price of a whore.] If such persons, as are mentioned in the foregoing verse, offered unto God what they had got by prostituting their bodies, it was not to be accepted, but rejected as abominable. For this was a custom among the idolatrous nations, as appears by a great many of their writers; who tell us, they were wont to dedicate some part of that which they received for the use of their bodies at the temples of their pretended deities. Particularly Herodotus mentions it, as done among the ancient Babylonians, lib. i. p. 199. Which explains what we read in Baruch, vi. 42, 43. where see Grotius's Annotations.

Nor the price of a dog, into the house of the Lord thy God.] There was a peculiar reason for this, besides the vileness of this creature, (which Maimonides only mentions, More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 46.) which was, as Bochartus, and some other great men think, because a dog was highly honoured among the Egyptians, from whom the Israelites were lately come. For the Nile was wont to overflow and enrich their country at the rising of the dog-star, and a dog was the symbol of one of their principal deities, called Anubis, who was represented with a head like that of a dog. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 56. p. 690, &c.) If we can think this vile idolatry was so ancient as the days of Moses, which it is certain prevailed afterward, this may pass for a very likely reason why God would not accept so much as the price for which a dog was sold or exchanged; for so the LXX. expound it: as, for example, if a man gave a lamb for a fine dog, God would not have that lamb offered at his altar; as Maimonides explains it.

For any vow.] There was the greatest obligation lay upon men to make good their vows, wherewith upon any occasion they had bound themselves; but God would have them discharged from such vile obligations as these.

For even both these are abomination unto the Lord thy God.] It is hard to give an account why these two (the price of a whore and of a dog) are associated in the same law; unless it be in opposition to some such rites as those beforementioned among the Egyptians. Who, in after-times, it is certain, had such harlots sacred to Isis, as many think are spoken of in the beginning of this verse; and a dog was no where else sacred as a symbol of Anubis, or Mercury. Though this may be said with some probability, that these two are joined together, because a whore and a dog are both alike impudent. Josephus thinks that the price of a dog here mentioned, was money given, ἐπ' ὀχεύσει κυνὸς, for the loan of a good dog to breed withal, as Mr. Selden observes in his History of Tithes, p. 57. Where he notes, also, that the Jews would not admit the tenths of usury or of war to be offered. But the Talmudists expound it quite otherwise, as I have done, for the price of a dog, either sold or exchanged for some other thing; which the same great man approves of as the truer interpretation, (lib. v. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 4. p. 557.)

Ver. 19. Thou shalt not lend upon usury to thy brother.] i. e. Unto an Israelite. (See Exod. xxii. 25. Lev. xxv. 36.)

Usury of money, usury of victuals, usury of any thing that is lent upon usury.] Here the word nesech is used for all sorts of usury; whether that which was made by the loan of money, called here nesech ceseph, or that which was made by the loan of food, and such-like things, called nesech okel. But, commonly, there are two words used to express this matter, viz. nesech, usury, and tarbith, which we translate increase. Which are not two kinds of usury, one more griping, the other more moderate, as some have conceived; for the same usury is called nesech with respect to the debtor, to whom it is grievous, and tarbith to the creditor, to whom it is beneficial. (See Salmasius, in his book de Usuris, cap. 7. p. 188.) Yet there is some difference between nesech and tarbith; else one cannot tell why they are so often both mentioned in the same place. And nesech properly signifies the interest, as we speak, which was paid for money; and tarbith, the interest of corn, and other fruits of the earth; as the same author shews in that book, (cap. 20. p. 614, &c.) And in the next book (de Modo Usurarum) he shews, that, as the LXX. and R. Levi ben Gersom thus understood the difference, so do the ancient fathers, particularly Origen and St. Jerome, (cap. 8. p. 320, &c.)

Ver. 20. Unto a stranger.] One that was not an Israelite, whether he dwelt out of their land, or in it; if he were not a proselyte to the law; of whom they might not take any usury, but use him as a brother.

Thou mayest lend upon usury.] Some of the Jews would have this to be an affirmative precept, obliging them to make the usury of a gentile, if they lent him any money. For this Maimonides quotes a passage out of Siphri; which others say he mistook. See J. Wagenseil, in his Annotations upon Lipman's Carmen Memoriale, p. 598. where he shews that he was of this cruel opinion. But this is not the common sense of the Jews, and their wise men have been so modest also as to decree, That though their law did here permit them to take usury of a gentile, yet they were not to practise it, unless it were that they might provide for themselves, that they might live more safely among the gentiles. And they add this reason for this limitation; Lest the Jews, by this way of commerce and traffic, should grow too familiar with the gentiles, and learn their manners: only men that studied the law, and thereby were out of danger of being enticed to their religion, might freely lend them money upon usury; for this very end, as they think, that they might make a gain of it, and enrich themselves. See Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 10. where he observes, that the Mahometans forbid usury only among themselves, not to strangers. Which Salmasius shews is thus limited in the Alcoran by these words, in their own territories. That is, if Mahometans live among Christians, they may take usury of them; but of Christians who live among them they may not take any, no more than of a Mussulman, as they call themselves.

But unto thy brother thou shalt not lend upon usury.] He repeats this again, that they might not fail to be kind one to another in this matter. And the author of Etz-Hachajim, mentioned by Wagenseil, saith, according to their ancient doctors, this is six times forbidden in the law, not to take usury of their brethren, (p. 601. upon Sota.) And, indeed, as there was nothing more rational than this, that their neighbours making great gain by merchandise (such as the Sidonians, Tyrians, and those that lived upon the Red Sea, and the Egyptians), they should not borrow money of the Israelites for nothing; so it was no less reasonable the Israelites themselves, whose chiefest profit was by husbandry and breeding of cattle, should have money lent them freely by one another, without any interest, their land not being a country of traffic, whereby money might be improved, as in other countries. For, by the laws of other nations, (as Grotius observes on Luke vi. 45.) that usury was odious which was practised upon husbandmen. Abarbinel also is so tender in this point, as to say, that usury hath something in it so unequal (at least as it is commonly practised), that God did not permit the Israelites to exercise it among all their neighbours, but only upon those of the seven nations of Canaan. And thus far he is in the right, that every one who was not a Jew, was not to be deemed a stranger: an Edomite, for instance, is called their brother in the seventh verse of this chapter; and, therefore, this precept, thou shalt not lend upon usury to thy brother, is to be extended to Edomites. In like manner, saith he, neither do the Ishmaelites come under the name of strangers, nor other people but those of the seven nations. And this opinion Leo Modena follows in his History of the present Jews, par. ii. chap. 5. where he saith, by the word stranger, in this place, none other can be meant but only those seven nations, from whom God commanded them to take away even their lives. And that it is only their present distress, in which they have no other way of livelihood left, that makes them think it lawful to lend upon usury to those among whom they live. In which I think he is mistaken; though this doctrine is better natured than that of some of the Jews, who are so full of hatred to us Christians, whom they call Edomites, that they deprive us (as Wagenseil observes in the place abovenamed) of the name of brethren, and think it lawful to oppress us with usury. Of which number are R. Bechai, and the author of the old Nitzacon, set forth by Wagenseil (ancienter than that of Lipman's, set forth by Theodoric Hackspan), who was so full of malignity, that he shut his eyes against the light which he plainly saw. For he could not deny that the Edomites were their brethren; and, consequently, that Moses required the Jews not to take usury of them; and that it was anciently unlawful. But then he pretends, that they forfeited this privilege by not coming to help to preserve Jerusalem and the temple from being destroyed, yea, by rejoicing at their ruin. And fearing this would not satisfy, he hath devised this justification of their usury, that the Edomites have made themselves strangers by the neglect of circumcision. (See p. 139.)

That the Lord thy God may bless thee in all that thou settest thine hand unto in the land whither thou goest to possess it.] Charity to their poor brethren had many promises of a great reward: and this law was made peculiarly for the relief of such persons, as appears by those places beforementioned, both in Exodus and in Leviticus. It extended indeed to all; but chiefly was intended as a provision for the poor and needy, whom they were not to neglect: for God ordered them to live together as brethren, children of the same father. And indeed they were all, rich and poor, descended from one and the same original. And therefore he designed there should be no indigent person unrelieved among this people, upon whom he had heaped so many blessings; and, delivering them from the slavery of Egypt, had planted them in the good land promised to their fathers. To which purpose all those precepts were given, which require them to lend gratuitously to their poor brother; to restore the pledge left with them; to leave the corners of their fields unreaped; not to gather the gleanings of the harvest and vintage; to observe the year of release and of jubilee; and such-like peculiar provisions for the comfort of the poorer sort, that they might share in the happiness which God bestowed upon his elect people.

Ver. 21. When thou shalt vow a vow unto the Lord thy God.] In a thing lawful and possible; and by a person who had power to make, and was not subject to the authority of another who had power to make it void. (See Numb. xxx. 2.)

Thou shalt not slack to pay it.] Lest they should prove less able, and so be unwilling to perform what they had vowed, or should perhaps forget it. If they lost the thing they vowed, while they delayed, they were bound to give the value of it. Which was one difference between a vow and a free-will-offering; that in the latter case (as Maimonides saith), if that which he designed was stolen or dead, he was not bound to make reparation. The same author applies this to a vow a man made of giving an alms to a poor body, suppose a shekel, which he was to bestow immediately, if any poor body was at hand; if not, he was to separate it, and lay it by till he met with one, &c. (cap. 8. de Donis Pauperum, sect. 1.)

For the Lord will surely require it of thee.] Demand that which thou hast made to be his own.

And it would be sin in thee.] Be punished by God's just judgment upon thee for the wrong thou hast done him.

Ver. 22. But if thou shalt forbear to vow, it shall be no sin in thee.] God was so very merciful, as Maimonides observes, that if a man was not able to offer him an ox, or a lamb, he accepted of turtles and young pigeons, of which there was great plenty in that country. And if this was beyond his ability, but he had a desire to testify his affection to God by a free-will-offering, he was pleased to accept an oblation of bread baked in an oven, or pan, or any other usual way. And if this was too heavy, he accepted of bare flour, without putting him to the charge of baking it. For he would have men to be easy in his service, and all their offerings to be free and cheerful; and therefore tells them here, that if they vowed nothing at all to him, he would not take it ill of them, nor impute it to them as a sin, (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 46.)

Ver. 23. That which is gone out of thy mouth thou shalt keep and perform; even a free-will-offering, according as thou hast vowed, &c.] This was to make them consider well beforehand what their ability was, and not rashly resolve and promise any thing: for though they were not bound to vow the smallest matter, yet having once vowed, they were no longer free, but bound to make it good, though it proved very chargeable to them. Yet there is a traditional doctrine among them practised at this day, that if any man or woman make a vow which afterward they wish unmade, and it be not to the prejudice of any third person that it should be broke, in this case they may go to a rabbin, or to any other three men, who hearing their reasons why they repent of having made such a vow, and judging them good, they may free them from their obligation, saying to such a person thrice, Be thou absolved from this vow, &c. and so he is discharged. Thus Leo Modena, in his History of the present Jews, par. ii. chap. 4.

Ver. 24. When thou comest into thy neighbour's vineyard, then thou mayest eat grapes thy fill at thine own pleasure.] This the Hebrew doctors take to be a law made in favour of poor labourers, who were hired to work in their vineyards in the time of vintage, whom the owners might not hinder from eating as many grapes as they pleased (and the same held good in olives, figs, dates, and all other fruit), as long as they were at work, but not after they had done working. And if their masters would not suffer them so to do, they were to be scourged with forty stripes save one; for it was not reasonable to deny them this liberty, when the very oxen were not to be muzzled whilst they trod out the corn. (See Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 2. p. 670.) Which must be confessed to be as good a natured law as that of Plato's was harsh and unnatural, which enacted a servant should receive as many stripes as he ate grapes or figs. (See Eusebius, lib. xiii. Præpar. Evangel. cap. ult.)

But I see no reason at all to restrain this indulgence only to hirelings, of whom there is no mention at all in this law; and therefore Josephus seems to me to have justly enlarged this benefit (lib. iv. Archæol. cap. 8.) to all travellers on the highway, though they were not Israelites (to whom, and to proselytes of justice alone, the Jews confine this privilege), but mere strangers of any other nation, who had occasion to pass by a vineyard, and needed a refreshment. Which permission may seem to have caused great inconvenience, if not mischief in it, because they might tread down the vines, and make great waste among the grapes. Therefore by coming into their neighbour's vineyard, is not meant going into every part of it, with a liberty to pick out the best grapes; but only stepping aside out of their way into the skirts of the vineyard, which lay near the road, and satisfying their hunger, without entering further into the vineyard. This made it no damage to the owners, considering the great plenty of fruit in that country.

But thou shalt not put any in thy vessel.] They were only to eat for their present necessity or delight, but not to carry any away with them for the benefit of others, or their own refreshment at another time. And, therefore, might not put any in their pouches, or their garments, or bosoms, or so much as carry away in their hands what they could not eat.

Ver. 25. When thou comest into the standing-corn of thy neighbour's, thou mayest pluck the ears with thine hand.] As the disciples of our Saviour did, when they walked through the corn, (Matt. xii. 1.) which they might have justified by the strictest rules of the pharisaical doctors, who granted this privilege unto Jews, but not unto gentiles.

But thou shalt not move a sickle into thy neighbour's standing-corn.] They might not cut down any corn, but only pluck with their hands as much as was necessary to satisfy their hunger, or for their pleasure.

CHAP. XXIV.

Ver. 1. WHEN a man hath taken a wife, and married her.] The Hebrew doctors make a difference between these two; understanding by taking a wife, his espousing her to be his wife; and by marrying her, his completing the contract, by lying with her.

And it come to pass.] Either after he hath espoused her, or after he hath consummated the marriage.

That she find no favour in his eyes.] i. e. He dislikes her; or, as it is expressed ver. 3. hates her. Which signifies either an absolute dislike to her, or comparatively with some person whom he likes better.

Because he hath found some uncleanness in her.] This is assigned as the reason and ground of his dislike, which signifies something odious to him, though, perhaps, it might not be so to another, whom Moses supposes she might marry after this husband had discharged her. Some of the Jews, indeed, extend this liberty so far, as to fancy they might, without any reason at all, for their mere pleasure, part with their wives. (See Buxtorf. de Sponsal et Divortiis, sect. 89.) But others are more modest, and acknowledge that these words [matter of uncleanness] signify some weighty cause. Yet they distinguish between the first wife a man took, who might not be put away but for some uncleanness, and the second, who might be put away for a lesser reason. But there were great differences between the school of Hillel and the school of Shammai (whom the Talmudists so much talk of), about this matter of uncleanness: yet both agree it hath a far lower signification here than in the book of Leviticus, where it signifies adultery, incest, or such-like turpitude. For if adultery had been here meant, she might have been put to death; or the mere suspicion of it tried by the water of jealousy. (See Buxtorf in the book beforenamed, sect. 90. and our Selden, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 20, 21.) Abarbinel thinks the two plainest causes of dislike signified by these words, were either such behaviour as might make her suspected of impurity (as going with her face uncovered, or her breast naked; sporting with young men, or washing in the same place with them, or having her arms bare); or, secondly, when they were of such a different temper, humour, and disposition, that they disliked and nauseated each other's company, and, consequently, lived in continual brawls and contentions. And, besides such moral causes, they allowed also such natural as made a woman offensive; viz. leprosy, or some such disease in her body, as he did not discover before marriage. And sometimes they extend this as far as to a stinking breath.

Then let him write her a bill of divorcement.] Whatsoever was the cause of the husband's dislike, this law provides the wife should not be damaged by it, being made rather for her advantage than her husband's; viz. to free her (as Dr. Hammond observes) from the pain and vexation of her husband's unkindness, and the danger of seeing another taken in, and preferred before her; and she might be perfectly at liberty to leave one, who did not love her, and take another husband who might possibly delight in her. (See Answer to six Queries, q. iii. chap. 2.) Some think that this custom of putting away wives, which they did not like, prevailed before the law of Moses. Which opinion hath something to countenance it, from the mention of divorces in several places (Levit. xxi. 14. xxii. 13. Numb. xxx. 9.) before the book of Deuteronomy was written, wherein he orders a bill to be given in writing to discharge them. If this be true, it gives a good reason why God was pleased to grant this permission; because they were so settled in this practice, that it was safer still to indulge it to them, than quite to abolish it. Which he did with this caution, That husbands should not discharge their wives with a word, bidding them begone out of doors (i. e. putting them away rashly, and in a sudden fit of anger), but first write them a bill containing their pleasure herein. Which being a deliberate act might possibly hinder this divorce; to which they might be prone in a passion, but not after some consideration. The form of this bill is in Mr. Selden, and exactly scanned, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 24. Who observes also, in another place of that book, (cap. 19.) that as, for five hundred years, or more, the Roman state flourished without the use of divorces, so for seven hundred years after the making of this law, there is no mention of any bill of divorce; so for seven hundred years after the making of this law, there is no mention of any bill of divorce among the Jews, that is, till the days of Isaiah, (see chap. l. 1.) and but rarely afterward.

And give it into her hand.] Saying these, or some such-like words, Behold, this is thy bill of divorce; otherwise it was not good: and there were to be at least two witnesses unto it, as the Jews say. Who make ten things necessary (which they think to be founded upon the law itself) to make the bill legal. (See Selden, in the same book, cap. 25.)

And send her out of his house.] This Dr. Hammond (in the place abovementioned) looks upon as an obligation upon her husband to furnish her for her journey, to endow her, and make provision for her. For so the word προπέμπειν, to send out, signifies in the New Testament, to provide a viaticum, 1 Cor. xvi. 6. 11. Titus iii. 13. where it is explained, by letting nothing be wanting. But the Jews are of opinion, that the divorce was perfect and legitimate, before he sent her out of his doors: for it was sufficient to give her a bill in such a form, as plainly shewed their matrimony was dissolved; and that she was no part of his family, though he had not actually sent her away. Yet, if he kept her still in his house, after this bill was delivered into her hand, it was presumed they cohabited together, and he was to give her a new bill of divorce.

In all which I can see nothing like a command for putting away their wives, if they were disagreeable; which the Jews would fain extort out of these words. And so they spake unto our blessed Lord, Matt. xix. 7. though in another place they spake of it only as a permission, Mark x. 3. The plain intent of this law being this; That if a man did put away his wife (as they are suffered to do), she might marry another man; but if that new husband died, she might not return to her first husband again. See Buxtorf. de Sponsal. et Divortiis, p. 107, 108, &c. and to shew that Moses rather supposed, than permitted divorces, p. 113, &c.

Ver. 2. And when she is departed out of his house.] So that it is publicly known, she is no longer his wife.

She may go and be another man's wife.] The bond of marriage being wholly broken by the bill of divorce, whereby he renounced all interest in her, and expressly said, in the very body of the bill (as we speak), it may be free to thee to marry with whom thou wilt. Much more was the bond broken by adultery, for which our Saviour gives a man leave to put away his wife, and take another. See David Chytræus concerning this matter, p. 117, &c. where he reports a very wise resolution of Luther's Pomeranus, and Melancthon, in the case of the criminal person.

Ver. 3. And if the latter husband hate her, and write her a bill of divorce, and give it her in her hand, and send her out of his house.] This shews that no other way of putting away a wife was allowed, but only this. For, as Maimonides well observes, (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 49.) if it had been lawful to do it by bare words, or simply sending her out of his house, any woman might have left her husband, and said she was put away; both she, and he that committed adultery with her, pretending a divorce, when her husband had given her none. Therefore the law wisely provided none should be put away, but by such a bill as is beforementioned, whereby an authentic testimony was given of it.

Or if her latter husband die, which took her to wife.] Whereby she became free again, as the apostle hath observed, Rom. vii. 2.

Ver. 4. Her former husband, which sent her away, may not take her again to be his wife.] One would have thought there could have been no danger of any man's desiring her again, whom he had solemnly sent away with dislike. But such is the levity and fickleness of human nature (the Jews at least were so inconstant), that it seems men sometimes sought after that which they had rejected: and this was the punishment of their injustice, in putting away a wife without sufficient cause (as by this they acknowledged), that they might not again enjoy her.

After that she is defiled.] This is the reason why the former husband might not marry her again (as the Jews take it), because by her second marriage she was defiled. Which they say she was (so that he could not have her again), though she had been only espoused to a new husband, who had never lain with her. For they make no difference between her second marriage and second espousals, but think a woman contracted such a pollution by her second espousals, that she would not have been so much polluted, if she had played the whore after her divorce. For in that case, they say, he might notwithstanding have married her again; but not after she had been married to another. Thus Mr. Selden reports their opinion, lib. i. Uxor. Heb. cap. 11. where he observes, that the Mahometans, who are wont in many things to ape the Jews, here quite differ from them; allowing a man liberty to take his wife again, though he had divorced her three times.

Now the ground upon which a divorced woman was accounted defiled, or unclean, after another man had married her, I suppose, was, that this was looked upon as a solemn renunciation of her former husband on her part, who had been renounced by him by the bill of divorce; but he was not absolutely renounced by her till she married another, whereby she was totally alienated from him. This made her unclean, not in herself, nor with respect to her second husband, whom she married, nor with respect to any other man (who might marry her without any pollution), but only with respect to her first husband, unto whom, by this law, she was made unclean; for so all things forbidden to the Jews were accounted, as appears from Acts x. 14, 15. where all meats prohibited by the law are called unclean; and God is said to have cleansed them, by taking off that prohibition.

For that is abomination before the Lord.] That is, to return to her first husband, and to be his wife again: for this, saith Abarbinel, was to imitate the Egyptians, who changed their wives, and took them again into their houses; which was the occasion of great filthiness. But this intimates, that if she had not been married to any other man, but kept herself free, she might have been his wife again, if he had a mind to be reconciled to her. And this shews also, that God intended to discourage them from putting away their wives, by making them incapable, after they had been married to another, for ever to enjoy them again, though they grew very rich, or otherwise desirable, which inclined many, no doubt, to consider well before they parted with them.

And thou shalt not cause the land to sin, which the Lord thy God giveth thee, &c.] The people of the land might, by such a large indulgence, have been tempted to pollute it with many sins, and thereby bring God's judgments upon it. (See Jer. iii. 1.) For, as Isaac Arama glosses, if this had not been prohibited, a gate had been opened unto vile men, to make a trade of changing their wives, and thereby filled the land with whoredoms.

Ver. 5. When a man hath taken a new wife.] The Hebrews think, (as I observed before, xx. 7.) that, whether he had married a virgin or a widow, he was to have the privilege here mentioned; yea, they extend it to him who had married his brother's wife; but not to him who had married her whom he put away, and might take again, if she had not been married since that to another man. For she could not be said to be a new wife.

He shall not go out to war.] See Deut. xx. 7.

Nor be charged with any business.] No public employment was to be put upon him, which might occasion his absence from his wife; not so much as watching, or such-like. For the better understanding of which, it must be remembered, what was said about the fearful and timorous, who were bid to return home from the army, lest they disheartened their brethren, xx. 8. And yet these men were bound to furnish the army with victuals and water, to clear the ways, and take up their quarters; but a new bridegroom was free from all these. Only they made a difference between a war by the Divine commandment, and one undertaken voluntarily: unto the former of which they think this immunity doth not extend, but only to the latter. In the margin these words are translated, nor any thing pass upon him, that is, he shall not pay tribute.

But he shall be free at home for one year.] The same time of freedom it was thought reasonable to grant unto builders and planters, because they are joined with new-married men in the speech the priest made before they went to battle, xx. 5—7.

And shall cheer up his wife whom he hath taken.] Make much of her, as we speak, and so endear himself to her by his kindness, that there might be no occasion of a divorce. For the prevention of which this law seems to have been intended; that by so long a conversation together, without any interruption, they might have so perfect an understanding one of another, and such a mutual confidence might be settled, that he might not easily entertain any jealousies of her, when he should be absent in the wars, or elsewhere.

Ver. 6. No man shall take the nether or the upper millstone to pledge.] This is a law of the same nature with that Exod. xx. 26, 27. for the preservation of mercy, beneficence, and clemency towards the poor, as Maimonides speaks, More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 39.

For he taketh a man's life to pledge.] That is, his livelihood; by which he maintains himself and his family, and keeps them from starving. By this reason it was unlawful to take any other thing for a security, by the want of which a man might be in danger to be undone. For instance, they did not allow any man to seize upon the oxen which were at plough. He who broke this law was scourged.

Ver. 7. If any man be found stealing any of his brethren the children of Israel.] If he were either taken in the fact, or it was plainly proved against him. So the very words of the Athenian law were, Ἐὰν τὶς φανερὸς γένηται ἀνδραποδιζόμενος, if a man be an apparent man-stealer.

And maketh merchandise of him, or selleth him.] This was the end of man-stealing, to make a gain of him, either by exchanging him for some commodity, or selling him for money.

Then that thief shall die.] This crime was punished with death, though stealing of beasts or other things was not, (see Exod. xxi. 16.) because it was very heinous on a double account, both by depriving the community of one of its members, and making him a slave in another country. And, indeed, the most moderate lawyers did not know how to secure men in the possession of things very valuable, but by inflicting such a punishment on those that stole them. Thus, after Solon had tempered the rigid law of Draco, which punished all theft with death, by ordering in most cases only the payment of double, he enacted the stealing of a great sum of money to be capital; nay, he made it a great crime to steal dung, because it was a thing of great value in that country, which was very barren, and needed it for their ground. How much more valuable was a man in all men's account, whom if any man stole, the law was τούτῳ θάνατον εἶναι τὴν ζημίαν, that death should be his punishment; as Xenophon reports it. And he was accounted ἀνδραποδιστὴς, a man-stealer, who, not only by force or by fraud, carried away a freeman, and sold him for a slave, or suppressed him; but he who inveigled away another man's servant, and persuaded him to run away, or concealed such a fugitive, (as Sam. Petitus observes, out of Pollux and others, lib. vii. Leges Atticas, tit. 5. p. 533.) Which makes me think, not only he that stole one of his brethren of the children of Israel, but he that stole a proselyte of any sort, or the servant of a stranger, was liable to the punishment mentioned in this law of Moses.

And thou shalt put away evil from among you.] By these words we may understand the greatness of his crime; for they are never used in this book, but when Moses speaks of the punishment of some enormous sin. (See xiii. 5. xvii. 7. xix. 19, &c.)

Ver. 8. Take heed of the plague of leprosy, that thou observe diligently.] This was the highest legal uncleanness, and therefore the greatest caution was to be used to prevent its contagion.

And do according to all that the priests the Levites.] They were constituted by the law the sole judges, whether a man had the leprosy or not; and were to order his separation from others if he had; and frequently make inspection, whether it spread, or was at a stand, &c. See the thirteenth and fourteenth chapters of Leviticus; where there are laws about houses and garments, as well as persons, infected with this disease by the hand of God, as the Jews understand it.

Shall teach you.] To teach in this place signifies to declare the obligation of the law by the judges of it, the priests the Levites. Thus Jehoshaphat is said to have sent his princes to teach in the cities of Judah, and with them he sent Levites and priests, 2 Chron. xviii. 18. where R. Solomon notes, that it was the business of the priests and Levites to teach and instruct, as is here written in this place (which he quotes), and the princes went with them, that none might disobey them, but be constrained by their authority to do according to their command. See Mr. Thorndike, in his Religious Assemblies, chap. 2. p. 22. where he observes, that, in Leviticus, direction is given to the priests how to proceed in judging leprosies; but no provision made till now, that the people should stand to their judgment.

They who imagine that the priest had the care of lepers, as their physicians, forget that no other diseased persons are ordered to repair to them; which is a sign they did not pretend to cure them, but only to preserve others from being defiled by them; and to do what was necessary for their cleansing, when they were healed by God.

As I commanded them, so shall ye observe to do.] They were so to observe the priests, as to mark what God commanded; and accordingly obey them, not against, but according to his command.

Ver. 9. Remember what the Lord thy God did unto Miriam by the way, after that ye were come forth out of Egypt.] This seems to be mentioned, that they might not think much to be shut up seven days, when they were but suspected to have the leprosy, and seven days more to make farther trial, and to be put out of the camp, when it appeared plainly they had this disease, (Lev. xiii. 4, 5. 45, 46.) since so great a person as Miriam was excluded so long from the society of God's people, (Numb. xii. 15.) And this may be looked upon as an admonition to take care, lest they spoke evil of dignities (which brought this punishment on Miriam), or disobeyed the commands of the priest, which might bring the like, or some other judgment upon them.

Ver. 10. When thou dost lend thy brother any thing, thou shalt not go into his house to fetch his pledge.] This was a very merciful provision for the poor, whose houses he would have so privileged, that no man might enter into them without their consent, and there choose what he pleased for the security of his debt: but he was to take what the borrower could best spare.

Ver. 11. Thou shalt stand abroad.] Keep without door.

And the man to whom thou dost lend shall bring out the pledge abroad unto thee.] So the debtor, not the creditor, was to choose what pledge he would give; for he best knew what he could, with most convenience to himself, part withal; and if it was sufficient, the lender had reason to be satisfied with it.

Ver. 12. And if the man be poor, thou shalt not sleep with his pledge.] But restore it before night. Which is to be understood of such things as were necessary for the preservation of his life or health, as the following words demonstrate.

Ver. 13. In any case thou shalt deliver him the pledge again when the sun goeth down, that he may sleep in his own raiment.] And not be forced to borrow of others a necessary covering to defend him from the cold; and not be able, perhaps, to procure it. (See Exod. xxii. 26, 27.) Which law seems to have been intended to keep them from taking any pledge of a very poor man. For to what purpose should they every morning fetch a pledge, and every evening carry it back again, which would only create them a great deal of trouble?

And bless thee.] Pray God to bless thee.

And it shall be righteousness unto thee before the Lord thy God.] Procure thee a blessing from God, who will esteem it an act of great mercy: which is often called by the name of righteousness in the holy books, Psal. cxii. 9. Prov. x. 2, &c. Nay, such-like actions are properly called tzedekah, or righteousness, according to the opinion of Maimonides, who observes, (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 53.) that this word doth merely signify giving to every man his own. "For when a man pays the hireling his wages, or a debtor pays his creditor, that is not called tzedekah: but what a man doth out of pure love to virtue and goodness (as when a man cures a poor wretch of his wounds), is properly called by that name. From whence it is said, concerning the restoring of a poor man's pledge, it shall be to thee for righteousness." That is, saith Dr. Hammond (in his Practical Catechism), that degree of mercy which the law required of every Jew, without which he could not be accounted righteous: but there was a degree of bounty beyond this called chasidah, which was an excess of righteousness or goodness.

Ver. 14. Thou shalt not oppress a hired servant.] Either by putting more work upon him than he is able to do, or by detaining his wages when it is done. The latter of these is most properly here denoted, as Const. L'Empereur observes out of D. Kimchi, who, in his Book of Roots, saith, the difference between עשק (which is the word here) and גזל doth not lie in this, that the former signifies to defraud, the latter to take away by violence: but the former signifies to detain by force, and the other to take away by force what belongs to another. And for the proof of it, alleges this place in Deuteronomy, which he thus translates, Thou shalt not detain by force the wages of the hireling. Which is expressed more clearly, Malachi iii. 5. Annot. in Bava-kama, cap. 9. sect. 7. p. 247.

That is poor and needy.] And therefore the more to be pitied, and not oppressed, either by giving him less wages than another man, when he ought rather to have greater, or by keeping back his hire beyond the time wherein it ought to be paid: for, as the ancient lawyers say, "Minus solvit, qui tempore minus solvit;" as it is observed by Grotius upon James v. 4.

Whether he be of thy brethren, or of thy strangers that are in thy land within thy gates.] No difference was to be made between a natural Jew and a proselyte of the gate, according to the general law, Lev. xix. 34. For such oppression might tempt them to do very wicked things: for instance, expose or kill their children, when they were not able to maintain them; after the manner of the heathen, who were frequently guilty of this, and thought it no crime when their poverty constrained them to it. See Petrus Petitus, lib. iii. Miscell. Observ. cap. 17. where he produces many proofs of it, both out of Greek and Roman authors.

Ver. 15. At his day thou shalt give him his hire.] Which was due to him, either by contract, or by natural equity; and whether he had agreed to serve him for a day, or a month, or a year. At the time when his wages was due, it was to be punctually paid, unless he were willing to have it remain in his hands. For this was not an act of mercy, but of justice, to pay a hireling his wages.

Neither shall the sun go down upon it; for he is poor.] This shews he speaks particularly of one that served for a day's wages, and could not forbear the payment of it, because he was so poor as not to be able to provide himself and family necessaries without it.

And setteth his heart upon it.] Eagerly expects it, as the support of his life. So the Vulgar translates it, With it he supports his soul, that is, his life.

Lest he cry unto the Lord.] Make grievous complaints to him who made both rich and poor.

And it be sin unto thee.] God will hear his cry, and severely punish thee. (See James v. 4.)

Ver. 16. The father shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the father: every man shall be put to death for his own sin.] This is a rule of common reason, which was anciently expressed in this vulgar saying, Noxa caput sequitur: and is excellently expressed by Dion Chrysostom, Ἕκαστος αὐτῷ γίνεται τῆς ἀτυχίας αἴτιος, Let every man be the author of his own misfortune. Which Amazia, king of Judah, thought extended to the children of traitors, unto whom he allowed the benefit of this law, as we read in so many words, 2 Kings xiv. 6. 2 Chron. xxv. 4. And not only Philo, but Dionysius Halicarnassæus condemns the custom of those nations who put to death the children of tyrants or traitors. See Grotius, lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 21. sect. 13, 14. where he observes, that God indeed threatens to visit the sins of the fathers upon the children; but in this case, "Jure dominii non pœnæ utitur," he uses the right of dominion, not of punishment.

Ver. 17. Thou shalt not pervert the judgment of the stranger, nor of the fatherless.] Nor of the widow, who is joined with them, ver. 19. For such persons commonly have none to stand by them, and plead their cause; and therefore the judges were to take the greater care to see them have justice done, (Exod. xxii. 21. xxiii. 9.)

Nor take the widow's raiment to pledge.] Which is to be understood of one that is poor; as appears from ver. 12. (See Exod. xxii. 21. 26, 27.)

Ver. 18. But thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in Egypt, and the Lord redeemed thee thence: therefore I command thee to do this thing.] The remembrance of their own miserable condition in Egypt, till God took pity upon them, was to work compassion in them towards others in like forlorn estate; otherwise they did not remember as they ought. This is often urged as a reason for shewing mercy to strangers, and such-like helpless persons, particularly in Lev. xix. 33, 34. and in this book, x. 19, 20. xv. 15.

Ver. 19. When thou cuttest down thine harvest in thy field, and hast forgot a sheaf in the field, thou shalt not go back again to fetch it.] There are many merciful laws about the poor. (See Lev. xix. 9, 10. xxiii. 22.) They are all put together by Mr. Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6. where the exposition the Talmudists give of this law seems to me to be so strict, that it could do little good. For they say a sheaf was not taken to be forgotten, unless not only the owner of the field, but all the labourers forgot it: and if none of them remembered it, yet if any man that passed by that way came and gave them notice of it, it was not looked upon as left by forgetfulness. Yet they are so kind as to extend this law, not only to the sheaves of corn left in the field, but to bunches of grapes, and other fruit, which were left behind in their vineyards or orchards. And it seems no unreasonable interpretation of this law, that if an owner of a field, or his workmen, called to mind, before they were gone quite out of the field, that a sheaf was left in such a place, they might go back and fetch it; but not, if they did not remember it till they came into the city. They that would see more cases about this matter, may look into Maimonides de Donis Pauperum, translated by Dr. H. Prideaux, (cap. 5.) and his very learned annotations upon it. Josephus seems to me to have interpreted this law most charitably, lib. iv. Archæolog. cap. 8. where he saith, they were not only not to go back to fetch what they had forgot, but to leave on purpose corn, and grapes, and olives, &c. for the benefit of the poor.

It shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow.] Who are commonly put together as proper objects of charity: and are (as Mr. Selden speaks) a kind of paraphrase upon the word poor.

That the Lord thy God may bless thee in all the work of thy hand.] Make their land still very fruitful: which was a reward of their charity.

Ver. 20. When thou beatest thine olive-tree.] As they were wont to do, in those countries, with sticks, to bring down the olives.

Thou shalt not go over the boughs again.] Not search the boughs, after they are beaten, whether any be left.

It shall be for the stranger, &c.] Who might go into the olive-yards, after the owner had carried out his fruit, and gather what they found still remaining on the trees.

Ver. 21. When thou gatherest the grapes of thy vineyard, thou shalt not glean it afterward.] By making a new gathering after the first. But if the poor themselves left any behind, after the usual time allowed for the gathering such fruits or corn as were left for them, it was lawful for the owner to take it himself; and he was not bound, either to pay the poor the price of it, or to leave it for the beasts and birds. For the command is (say the Jewish doctors, who nicely scan these things), that it shall be for the poor, and that it be left for them; but not any thing given them in lieu of it. (See Selden, in the forenamed place, p. 699.)

It shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow.] The Jewish doctors, by the stranger here mentioned, in this and the foregoing verses, would have only proselytes of justice understood, who had entirely embraced the Jewish religion; so that other proselytes, and mere gentiles, had no right to these things. For by the law, say they, concerning the tithe for the poor, (xiv. 29.) the Levite and the stranger are put together: and the Levite being a child of the covenant, so must the stranger be, who is joined with him. But this restriction confined this charity within such narrow bounds, that they themselves are not satisfied with it: and therefore they add, that though such only as were within the covenant had a right to these things by the law, yet, if proselytes of the gate, or mere gentiles, mixed themselves with the Jews, by the decree of their wise men, they were not to be hindered from gathering their share in these fruits of the earth which were left for the poor. And they give this reason for it, because of the way of peace, that is, offices of humanity and charity ought to be extended to all. (See Selden, p. 700.)

Ver. 22. And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt: therefore I command thee to do this thing.] If they had been only strangers there, and neglected by the natives of the country, the remembrance of God's mercy in providing for them had been a powerful motive to obey this command: and therefore the remembrance of the slavery and grievous oppressions under which they there groaned was a far greater. (See ver. 18.)

CHAP. XXV.

Ver. 1. IF there be a controversy between men, and they come into judgment.] It is evident, by the sequel, that he speaks of criminal causes.

That the judges may judge them.] Who were appointed to be constituted and settled in all their gates. (See xvi. 18.)

Then they shall justify the righteous.] Acquit him who is falsely accused of doing any wrong.

And condemn the wicked.] To suffer such punishment as his crime deserves.

Ver. 2. And it shall be, if the wicked man be worthy to be beaten.] For what crimes men were to be beaten, by the sentence of the lower courts, as well as by that of the great Sanhedrin, see Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 13. n. 7, 8. They were in all, as they reckon, two hundred and seven.

The judge shall cause him to lie down.] By his officers who attended the court.

Before his face.] In open court. But he was first to be admonished; and the witnesses were to be produced against him, as in capital causes: after which the judge commanded him to lie down before a low pillar, to which his hands were tied; and he being stripped down to his waist, the executioner stood behind him upon a stone, where he scourged him both on the back and breast, with thongs made of an ox's hide, before the face of the judges: for though one judge be only mentioned, the execution was done before the whole bench, after the sentence was pronounced by one of them.

According to this fault.] For the violation of a negative precept he might be scourged before the court, consisting of three judges; but not for the violation of an affirmative, which was to be done before the court of twenty-three, as Selden observes in the place forenamed, sect. 6.

By a certain number.] He was condemned to receive more or fewer stripes, proportionable to his crime: and all the time the executioner was scourging him, the principal judge proclaimed these words, (Deut. xxviii. 58.) with a loud voice, "If thou observest not all the words of this law, &c. then the Lord shall make thy plagues wonderful," &c. adding those, xxix. 9. "Keep therefore the words of this covenant, and do them," &c. Concluding at last with those of the Psalmist, lxxviii. 38. "But he being full of compassion, forgave their iniquities." Which he was to repeat, if he had finished these sayings before the full number of stripes were given. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 13. n. 6. which I find in the title Maccoth, cap. 3. sect. 16. and see G. Schickard, Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 2. p. 57, 58.)

Ver. 3. Forty stripes he may give him.] Which was more merciful than the Athenian law mentioned by Æschines, which was inflicted upon criminals, τῇ δημοσίᾳ μάστιγι πεντήκοντα πληγὰς, fifty stripes by the public scourge. But none among the Jews were to receive above forty for any crime; fewer they might inflict, though not more.

And not exceed.] Of this they were so careful, that as one of the three judges commanded the executioner to strike, another told the stripes, while the third pronounced the sentences out of the Scripture beforementioned, to admonish him, and every one else, of the justice of the punishment. So Schickard observes, out of Maimonides, in the place abovenamed. For the prevention also of excess in this punishment, they were wont to give but thirty-nine stripes, and no more; though the offender was ever so strong or pertinacious. Thus the Jews generally affirm, and it appears to be true, by what St. Paul saith of himself, 2 Cor. xi. 24. "Of the Jews five times I received forty stripes save one;" which is exactly the phrase of Mischna in Maccoth, cap. 3. sect. 10. where they interpret forty stripes by the next number to forty, i. e. thirty-nine. For which they give a foolish reason in the Gemara (as Joh. Coch there observes); but Maimonides gives a sober account, that this was ordered, lest the executioner, by carelessness, might exceed the number of forty, beyond which the law required them not to go; but it was lawful to fall short of it, and therefore they required him to stop at the thirty-ninth stroke. Yet, if any man deserved this punishment twice together, they did sometimes exceed the number of forty, and went so far as to sentence such a malefactor to receive seventy-nine stripes; as Mr. Selden observes in the same place: where he likewise notes, on the other side, that if a man was so weak, that he was ready to faint away, before he had received thirty-nine, the judges ordered the executioner to stay his hand.

Lest, if he should exceed, and beat him above these with many stripes, then thy brother should seem vile unto thee.] Being beaten like a dog, as we speak; that is, so cruelly, that the marks of it remained afterward, to make him contemptible. Which the law was so far from intending, that the Jews say no man was to be reproached afterward with this whipping, or the crime for which he was whipped, because he was still a brother, as the word here is. And therefore he was to be restored to the same respect among them that he had before, nay, to any office which before he enjoyed; except he was the president of the Sanhedrin, who was never to be restored to his power, if he had been scourged, nor equally honoured with his inferior colleagues. So Schickard observes, out of Maimonides, in the forenamed book, p. 62.

Ver. 4. Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn.] It was the custom, not only in this country, but among the Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans, to use oxen in treading out their corn, either with their feet barely, or by drawing a cart, or other instrument, over it. And while they were at work some muzzled them, and others daubed their mouths with dung; others hung a wooden instrument about their necks, which hindered them from stooping down; or put sharp pricks in their mouths; or kept them without drink; or covered their corn with skins, that they might not be able to come at it. (See Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 40. p. 401.) Which inhumanity God here forbids, and instructs his people, by shewing mercy to their beasts, to be kind one to another, particularly to their servants and labourers, but, above all, to those who laboured in the work of the ministry, for the salvation of souls, as St. Paul argues, 1 Cor. ix. 9. (See Bonfrerius.)

Ver. 5. If brethren dwell together.] They are said to dwell together, not only who were in the same family, but in the same country, Gen. xiii. 5, 6.

And one of them die, and have no child.] If he left a child, though he were a mamzer, or an apostate, his next brother was not bound to marry his wife; but if he left a child by a slave, or a gentile, he was. If he left his wife with child, and she miscarried, he was bound; but if she brought a live child, after she had gone with it nine months, he was free. And by a child is to be understood either a son or daughter. (See Selden, lib. de Successionibus ad bona Defuncti, cap. 14.)

The wife of the dead shall not marry without unto a stranger.] This shews the end of this law was to preserve inheritances in the family to which they belonged.

Her husband's brother shall go in unto her, and take her to him to wife.] The Hebrew doctors understand this obligation to lie upon the eldest brother that was surviving; and only of a brother that was by the same father. For though they had the same mother, if they had not the same father, no obligation lay upon him: "For brethren (saith Maimonides) by the mother's side, are not accounted brethren, either in the matter of inheritances, or of marrying a brother's wife: but they are as if they were not brethren; for there is no fraternity which is not from the father." (See Heideggerus Exercit. i. de Œconom. Patriarch 10. 16. and Selden, Uxor. Hebr. p. 80.) But the king, they say, was excepted from this law, as Schickard observes in his Jus Regium, p. 56.

And perform the duty of a husband's brother to her.] This was a law before the time of Moses, among the patriarchs, as we learn from Gen. xxxviii. 7, 8, &c. And it was so well understood to be a bounden duty, that the Hebrew doctors say, it was not necessary there should be any solemn marriage celebrated with such widow; because, unless her husband's brother renounced her, she was esteemed his wife, min hashamajim, by the authority of God; and that, whether she had been only espoused by the deceased brother, or his complete wife. Yet by the constitution of their elders, he was to contract with her before two witnesses, and give her a piece of money; before which it was not lawful for him to lie with her. There was to be also a sacred benediction of the marriage; and her dowry assigned her by an instrument. But if he did lie with her before these solemnities, there was no formal contract exacted of him afterward; he was only scourged for contemning the constitutions of their elders, and compelled to settle a dowry upon her. See Selden, lib. i. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 12. where he observes, that, in case a man left several widows, if his brother either married, or renounced one of them, all the rest were free from this law. And if several brethren died, and left every one of them a wife, without issue, the surviving brother might either take or reject them all; or take one or two, and let the rest alone, as he pleased. And if the eldest brother, that married his brother's relict, died also without issue, then the next surviving brother was to marry her; and so forward, according to the case supposed in the gospel. And yet that brother only was admitted to this marriage, who was born before his brother's death; which they gather from the first words of this verse, if brethren dwell together; which cannot be meant of one born after his brother's death. They might likewise have concluded, from this phrase, that such of the brethren as had wives already were not bound to take her to wife, but only he that was unmarried; who might be supposed to be meant by him that dwelt together with his brother, and was not yet gone to a house of his own. But I fear I have said too much of a matter now quite antiquated, unless it be among some of the Indians and Persians, and among the Tartars that inhabit Iberia and Albania, who still retain this custom; as Huetius observes, in his Demonstratio Evangel. propos. iv. cap. 11. n. 1.

Ver. 6. And it shall be, that the first-born which she beareth shall succeed in the name of his brother which is dead.] Shall be reputed the son and heir of the deceased; but there was no necessity to give him his name.

That his name be not put out in Israel.] That a family in Israel might not be lost; for this was a provision for the preservation of families. (See Numb. xxvii. 4.) And therefore, if there was no brother, properly so called, to perform this duty, the next of kin (who is also called a brother in a large sense) was bound to marry her. See of this word name, Numb. xxvii. 4.

Ver. 7. And if a man like not to take his brother's wife.] Here now was a great mitigation of that ancient law, which had been before the time of Moses, that a man might refuse to marry his brother's wife, if he did not like her. Which was not permitted before, as appears by the story of Onan, (Gen. xxxviii.) who married Tamar against his mind (as his behaviour towards her demonstrates), which he needed not to have done, if this permission, which here follows, had been then in use.

Then let his brother's wife go up to the gate.] Where the court of judgment sat, as I have often observed. (See xvi. 18.)

Unto the elders.] A court consisting of three elders was sufficient to judge in this matter. And it was of no consequence, whether these three were created elders, according to the solemn form among them, by laying on of hands; but it was sufficient, if they were such as they called elders of the street, or common men. (See lib. i. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 15. and lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 7. n. 3.)

And say, My husband's brother refuseth to raise up unto his brother a name in Israel: he will not perform the duty of my husband's brother.] She was to put a bill of complaint against him in these words.

Ver. 8. Then the elders of the city shall call him, and speak to him, &c.] He being summoned to appear before them, together with the woman (who they say was to be fasting), and two witnesses at the least, she opened the whole matter. And then the question being asked, whether it were three months since her husband's death (which were to be allowed, to see whether she proved with child or not), and whether this man was next of kin; and a satisfactory answer being returned, the judges laid the law before them, admonished them seriously to consider, on each side, their age, or any disparity or incommodity that might be in their marriage, and accordingly to resolve; and then they asked the man, in express words, whether he would marry her, and raise up seed to his brother. If he stood to his first resolution, as it here follows, and said, I like not to take her; then the woman read the words foregoing, ver. 7. My husband's brother refuseth to raise up unto his brother a name in Israel, &c. and then proceeded to do as follows, ver. 9. (See Selden, in the book forenamed, cap. 14.)

Ver. 9. Then shall his brother's wife come unto him, in the presence of the elders, and loose his shoe from off his foot.] From his right foot, as the Hebrew doctors say; which was done, I suppose, as a mark of infamy, for his want of natural affection; which made him unworthy to be reckoned among freemen, but rather deserve to be thrust down into the condition of slaves, who were wont to go barefoot.

And spit in his face.] In contempt of him who had despised her. The Hebrew doctors, indeed, expounded this only of her spitting upon the earth, directly before his face, so that the spitting might be seen by the judges. And they give this as a reason, why the king was not subject to this law of marrying his brother's wife, (and they might add the high-priest, Lev. xxi. 13, 14.) because it would have been below his dignity to have had his shoe pulled off (if he had not liked the woman), or to have had her spit before him, as Bartenora's words are: which would have been a better reason, if they had said, it had been very unbecoming for her to have spit in the king's face. See Selden, lib. i. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 10. and Hackspan, lib. i. Miscellan. cap. 7. n. 8. where he observes, the king was bound to all the six hundred and thirteen precepts, but only this of marrying his brother's wife.

And shall answer.] To his peremptory refusal of her.

And say, So shall it be done unto that man that will not build up his brother's house.] She was immediately to read these words of the law. And then the judges gave her a writing, signifying his renunciation of her, in the manner now related, that so it might be free for any other man to marry her. See the form of it in Selden, lib. i. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 14. where he hath observed certain niceties about the kind of shoe that was to be pulled off, but gives no account why this ceremony was used.

Ver. 10. And his name shall be called in Israel, The house of him that hath his shoe loosed.] As soon as she had loosed his shoe, both the judges, and all the by-standers round about, cried aloud three times, The shoe is pulled off, the shoe is pulled off, the shoe is pulled off! And thereupon his family had this name, as a disgrace, for not doing the duty of a brother. Some will have this pulling off the shoe to have been only a mark, that he parted with his right to her; but these words shew that it was in the nature of a brand upon him and his posterity. And so Josephus saith, lib. iv. Archælog. cap. 8. that he went out of the court with a mark of ignominy. Which doth not relate merely to her spitting in his face; for Maimonides saith expressly, (in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 49.) that this action (viz. of pulling off the shoe, as well as the other) was a foul and ignominious thing in those days, intended to move men to perform the duty of a husband's brother, that they might avoid such reproach. J. Wagenseil hath given us the exact form of the shoe, which was used on such occasions, in his Annotations upon Sota, p. 664. and see 1212. where he commends Leo Modena's account of this whole business; which differs not at all from that which I have given; only I observe that he saith, when the woman taketh off the shoe from the man's foot, she lifts it up on high, and throweth it against the ground; which I take to be a note of indignation and contempt. And he saith also, it was anciently accounted a more laudable thing to take her, than to release her; and imputes it to the corruption of men's manners, and the hardness of their hearts, that now they look only after worldly ends, either of riches or beauty: which makes very few in these days (especially among the Dutch and Italian Jews) to marry their brother's widow. (See his History of the Rites and Customs of the Jews, par. iv. chap. 7.)

Ver. 11. When men strive together one with another.] Fall out (as we speak) and fight, either with their fists or sticks, or other weapons.

And the wife of one draweth near for to deliver her husband out of the hand of him that smiteth him.] Who had wounded him, and was likely, I suppose, to be too hard for him.

And putteth forth her hand, and taketh him by the secrets.] As a sure means to make him let go his hold of her husband, that he might preserve himself.

Ver. 12. Then thou shalt cut off her hand.] This was to be done by the sentence of the court, as a punishment for her impudence; and for the hurt which, perhaps, the man might have received hereby in those parts whereby mankind is propagated.

Thine eye shall not pity her.] The word her not being in the Hebrew text, several of the Jews (and Grotius seems to approve their opinion) interpret this law quite otherwise; as if the woman might both take hold of his secrets for the delivery of her husband, and also cut off the other man's hand; and they should not pity him who suffered thus, nor punish the woman, who might do any thing of this nature, to preserve one so dear to her as her husband: but this is a very forced interpretation. Maimonides is a little more reasonable in his exposition of these words, which he will have to signify, that they should lay a fine or a mulct upon her for her immodesty; which is suitable to their interpretation of that law, Exod. xxi. 24. "Eye for eye, tooth for tooth," &c. (See L'Empereur on Bava-kama, p. 198.) But it is an intolerable presumption in Maimonides to say, that if any one interpret this of a proper abscission of the woman's hand, though he pretend to be a prophet, and say, The Lord hath said unto me these words, Thou shalt cut off her hand, are to be understood as the words sound (i. e. literally as we speak), and do a miracle to confirm it, he is to be looked upon as a lying prophet, and may be put to death, because it is contrary to the constant tradition of their elders. So he writes Seder Zeraim, translated by our famous Dr. Pocock, p. 15. 38. Upon which principle they killed our blessed Saviour.

Ver. 13. Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights.] In the Hebrew the words are, a stone and a stone: for their weights were then made of stone, as are ours now commonly of lead or brass.

A great and a small.] To buy in commodities with the great, and sell them out again by the small; which was then and is now an usual way of cheating.

Ver. 14. Thou shalt not have in thine house divers measures, &c.] In the Hebrew, an ephah and an ephah: for this was the most known measure among them, by which all the rest of their measures were made. (See Exod. xvi. 36.) From hence it was that Lucius Ampelius thought Mochos, that is Moses (who by ancient writers is called Moschos), was the inventor of weights and measures, because he took such pious care there should be no deceit in them, as the most learned Huetius observes in his Demonst. Evangel. prop. iv. cap. 8. n. 16.

Ver. 15. But thou shalt have a perfect and just weight, and a perfect and just measure.] Neither too scanty nor too large. See Lev. xix. 35, 36. where all these three verses are sufficiently explained.

That thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.] Justice, as well as charity, was necessary to prolong their happiness in the land of promise, (xvi. 20.)

Ver. 16. For all that do such things, and all that do unrighteously.] All that any way wrong their neighbours.

Are an abomination to the Lord thy God.] This is an expression commonly used, to declare God's hatred of all idolatrous practices. (See xviii. 9. 12.)

Ver. 17. Remember what Amalek did unto thee by the way, when ye were come forth out of Egypt.] The Jews have framed three precepts out of this and the two following verses. One is, that they should remember what Amalek did unto them. Which Maimonides, according to their oral tradition, refers to the mouth, that they should always be talking of what Amalek did to them. The second, not to forget it; which he refers to their heart: that they should never let slip out of their mind the hatred Amalek had to them. And the third, that they should blot out their remembrance from under heaven, i. e. utterly destroy them, and leave none of them remaining. But none of the Jews have explained this better than Abarbinel; who, inquiring why such severity was expressed against the Amalekites, when the Edomites, who were of the same race, were dealt withal very favourably, (as we read before, xxiii. 8.) observes four reasons given here by Moses himself, why they should remember, when they were settled in the land of Canaan, and able to effect it, to exterminate this nation: for that is the single precept he gives them in charge; only he bids them not forget what Amalek had done to deserve that heavy sentence long ago passed upon them, and remaining on record, (Exod. xvii. 14—16.) confirmed with a solemn oath, though they were not able to execute it till they were settled in the land of promise. The first of these reasons is, because, whereas men undertake war against others, either to defend their own country, or to subdue their enemies' country, the Amalekites came forth against the Israelites without any such cause; for the Israelites did not pass by their country, and consequently gave them no apprehension of an invasion; nor had the Israelites then possession of any land of their own, which might tempt the Amalekites to covet it, and drive them out of it. But they undertook this war, with a petulant malice, only to bring them into slavery again. Which is the thing here intimated in this verse, Remember what Amalek did to thee, &c. Unto which he should have added, that their barbarity was much aggravated, by their assaulting them when they were newly delivered from grievous oppressions, and were unaccustomed to war, and without any provocation.

Ver. 18. How he met thee by the way.] This the same Abarbinel takes to be the second cause of God's high displeasure against Amalek: that, whereas it is the custom of all countries, before they begin a war, to denounce it by heralds, shewing the grounds of it, they rose up against the Israelites unexpectedly; which was a piece of the basest treachery. Which he thinks is intimated in these words, he met thee by the way; that is, on a sudden, by surprise, without any notice by a declaration of war. He might have added, that they did this when the Israelites were in a journey, and had travelled a great way, and in a wilderness, where they stood in need of refreshment; but were very unfit for fighting. Then, saith one of their rabbins, in Pirke Eliezer, cap. 44. "they came in like a bear in their way, to devour the mother with the children."

And smote the hindermost of thee, even all that were feeble behind thee, when thou wast faint and weary.] This he makes the third cause; that they did not offer them a pitched battle, but only fell upon their rear (as we speak), and there cut off such as lagged behind through feebleness and weariness, being unable to march so fast as the rest of their brethren. This is, in a very sober sense, suitable to the use of the word in Josh. x. 19. But what some of the Jews say, that the Amalekites cut off the privy members of certain of the tribe of Dan, in derision of circumcision, is disowned by others of them, as having no foundation. See Schickard, in his Jus Regium, p. 112, 113. where Carpzovius observes, this was only a fancy of their midraschim, or preachers, wherewith they entertained the people in their sermons, on occasion of the ambiguity of the word we translate cut off the hindermost. Which R. Zacharias much better interprets, in Pirke Eliezer, cap. 44. where he makes it to signify all that were behind the cloud (which protected those who were under it), as those who went out of the camp, by reason of some uncleanness, to wash themselves. But this is no more than an ingenious conceit; for the laws about cleansing were not then delivered.

And feared not God.] This he makes the fourth cause; that though they feared Israel, whom they durst not look in the face, but cut them off behind, yet they feared not God, who had done such wonderful things for them in Egypt, and brought them thence with a mighty hand, and overthrown Pharaoh in the Red Sea. Which might have made them understand, that he sets up kings and pulls down kings, as Daniel speaks, ii. 21. But instead of considering this, they would have profaned the glory of the Lord (as he speaks), by enslaving those whom he had but newly delivered, and continued under the protection of a glorious cloud. Unto all which may be added, that they were originally derived from the same stock with the Israelites; viz. from Isaac.

Ver. 19. Therefore it shall be, when the Lord thy God hath given thee rest from all thy enemies round about, in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.] God did not require them to put this command in execution immediately after they were possessed of the land of Canaan, but after they were well settled there: so that there were some ages passed before they went about it; and then God himself put them in mind of it; or rather strictly enjoined it to be performed by Saul their first king: and we do not find them blamed for not doing it in the time of the judges, (1 Sam. xv. 1—3.)

Thou shalt blot out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven.] So God commandeth Saul in the place now mentioned, utterly destroy all they have, and spare them not; but slay both men and women, &c. For by the same justice that one person is cut off, a whole family, or a whole nation, may be utterly destroyed: that other families or nations, seeing or hearing God's judgments upon them, may be moved to flee from that wickedness for which they are punished. They are the words of Maimonides, par. iii. More Nevochim, cap. 41.

If we could believe all that the Talmudists say, we might think there were some among the Jews who endeavoured to mollify the severity of this precept: for they tell a story in Bava-bathra of Joab's master, who taught him to read it thus; Blot out zechar, the male of Amalek, not zecher, the remembrance. But at the same time they tell us, Joab thought to have killed him for leading him into an error.

Thou shalt not forget it.] This is not a distinct precept, but only a repetition of the foregoing; to imprint it more on their minds and hearts. And accordingly the Jews pretend to have had their hearts so set upon it, that when the officers were about to proclaim freedom from war to those persons mentioned xx. 5, 6, &c. they always excepted the war against the seven nations and Amalek, in which every body was bound to assist.

I shall end this matter with an observation of Abarbinel, that in this paragraph about Amalek, the injunction which God gave to Moses, Exod. xvii. 14. was fulfilled by him: Write this for a memorial in a book. No other book, saith he, is hereby meant, but the book of the law, which when Moses wrote, he was bound to mention this precept about Amalek; which he doth in this place. And if we suppose that he immediately wrote a distinct history of this matter, yet he inserted it afterward into the Pentateuch, both here and in the book of Exodus.

CHAP. XXVI.

Ver. 1. AND it shall be, when thou art come into the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance, and possessest it, and dwellest therein.] When they had a settled possession of the several inheritances, which fell to their share in the land of Canaan.

Ver. 2. That thou shalt take of the first of all the fruit of the earth.] This is not meant merely of the first first-fruits they should have after they were settled in Canaan, but of the first-fruits they should have every year; which being the most desirable (as Conradus Pellicanus here observes) of all other, and coveted by every one, majori aviditate, with a greater appetite than ordinary, nature itself directed men to offer them to God, the giver of all good things. And these were distinct from that mentioned Lev. xxiii. 10. being of all the fruits of the earth. The principal of which being seven, the Jews commonly say, these only were to be carried to God; viz. wheat, barley, grapes, figs, pomegranates, olives, and dates. Some of the doctors say, the first-fruits of all kind of things whatsoever were due; and a question being raised, whether a stranger was bound to pay them or not, some of them say, no; because they could not use the protestation mentioned ver. 3. But the more common opinion is, that they might both bring first-fruits and use the protestation, because Abraham was also the father of strangers, (Gen. xvii. 5.) And it may be, saith R. Bechai, that is pointed at ver. 11. of this chapter; where it is said, "Thou, and the Levite, and the stranger that is among you."

Which thou shalt bring of thy land, which the Lord thy God giveth thee.] In order to which, they say, every owner of land, when he went into his ground, and found any figs, or bunch of grapes, or a pomegranate more forward than the rest, he was to tie a rush about it, and write upon it, these are first-fruits. So Wagenseil, and many others, have observed out of the title Biccurim, cap. 3.

And shalt put it in a basket.] The quantity of each, they say, was to be at least a sixtieth part. And they might be all put into the same basket, provided they were not mingled, but preserved distinct; barley being laid at the bottom, and then wheat, and next olives, and above them dates, and then pomegranates; and last of all, figs and grapes, being hung on the outside; and leaves of palm, or other trees, put between every kind of first-fruits.

R. Bechai saith, that the rich brought these fruits in baskets of gold and silver, that is, covered with gold or silver (as Maimonides speaks); and we read of the like golden baskets carried by virgins, in the feast of Bacchus at Athens. (See Ezek. Spanhemius on Callimachus's hymn to Ceres, p. 733.) Now, if the basket here mentioned was made of these, or any other metal, the Jews say, the priest was to restore it to the owner, when he had emptied it: but if it was a wicker basket, or such-like, the priest had it together with the first-fruits. (See Wagenseil upon Mischna Sota, cap. 7. sect. 3.)

And shalt go unto the place which the Lord thy God shall choose to place his name there.] The man himself was to go, as the Jews say, with the basket upon his shoulder: and a great company were wont to go together, who met at the chief city of their province. The time of going was at the feast of Pentecost, (Exod. xxiii. 16.) not before, but at any time after, till the feast of dedication, which was in our November: after which they were not accepted. Of the manner of going up with a bullock before them, whose horns were gilt, and head crowned with an olive garland, with music, and singing in the way the first verse of Psalm cxxii. &c. see Wagenseil, in the place abovementioned; and Selden, lib. iii. de Synedriis, cap. 13. n. 3. with Dr. Lightfoot in his Temple Service.

And here I cannot but think fit to note, that the heathen, in all probability, from hence derived the custom of carrying their first-fruits, as a tithe every year, unto the island Delos, where Apollo was supposed to have his special residence. And this not only from the islands thereabouts, and the neighbouring countries, but from all parts of the world; as the Jews we find every where sent, from the countries where they dealt, a sum of money every year, instead of first-fruits and tithes, unto Jerusalem; which privilege the Romans allowed them, after they had conquered them, as Josephus tells us, lib. vii. de Bello Jud. cap. 13. That heathen custom, now mentioned, is expressed by Callimachus, in his hymn upon Delos, in those remarkable words, ver. 278, 279, &c.

> Ἀλλά τοι ἀμφιτεῖς δεκατοφόροι αἰὲν ἀπαρχαὶ
> Πέμπονται· πᾶσαι δὲ χοροὺς ἀνάγουσι πόληες
> Αἵτε πρὸς ἠοίην, αἵ θ' ἕσπερον, αἵ τ' ἀνὰ μέσσην
> Κλήρους ἐστήσαντο, καὶ οἳ καθύπερθε βορείης.

The sense of which is this: That first-fruits were sent for tithes every year from all countries, not only from the east, and west, and south, but from the north also. And they were sent with such joy, as the Jews expressed on this occasion; for all cities, he saith, did χορους ἀνάγειν. And so we read in several authors, that there were θεωρίαι, as they called them, solemn embassies sent from several people, by chosen persons, unto Delos, to celebrate there the feast of Apollo with music and dancing, &c. Particularly the Athenians, Peloponnesians, and Messenians, &c. of whom see Ezek. Spanhemius, in his Observations on Callimachus, p. 487. And, which is most strange, the Hyperboreans, a very northerly people, sent frugum primitias to this island, as Pliny, and I know not how many other authors, testify. Only what he calls the first-fruits of their corn, and such-like things, they call the first-fruits of their holy things: as the same excellent person observes there, (p. 490. 492, &c.) Which was done to testify their honour to this god, and for the maintenance of his priests and other ministers, who attended upon him there. For Delos, of itself, was but a barren isle, the soil being dry and stony, and called therefore by Callimachus, ver. 208. δυσήροτος.

There are other footsteps of this among the heathen; the mystica vannus iacchi, mentioned by Virgil in his Georgics, being nothing else (according to Servius), but vas vimineum, a wicker basket, in which their first-fruits were carried. (See the same Spanheim, p. 495.)

Ver. 3. And thou shalt go unto the priest that shall be in those days.] Who was then in attendance at the sanctuary, and particularly appointed to wait for their coming. When they entered the gates of the city, they sung the second verse of Psalm cxxii. "Our feet shall stand in thy gates, O Jerusalem:" and then they went to the mountain of the temple, and sung the whole hundred and fiftieth Psalm: and as soon as they entered the court of Israel, the Levites began to sing, Psal. xxx. 1. "I will extol thee, O Lord my God," &c.

And say unto him.] The following confession in this verse was made by them with the baskets on their shoulders, to stir them up to humility, as Maimonides interprets it. His words are these: "While they were compelled to carry their baskets on their shoulders, and in that manner to proclaim the Divine benefits, it signified that it was a considerable part of God's worship and service, for a man to be mindful of his afflictions and tribulations, when God had given him ease and rest from them. This the law takes care of, in several places; as when it saith, 'Thou shalt remember that thou wast a servant,' &c. with this intention, that he who lived in riches and pleasure, might be secured from the vices which spring from thence, such as pride, haughtiness, apostacy, and the like. According to what is said in this book, viii. 12. 'Lest thou eat, and art full,' &c. and xxxii. 15. 'Jesurun waxed fat, and kicked,' &c. To prevent which, God commanded the first-fruits to be thus offered every year to his Divine Majesty." (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 39.)

I profess this day unto the Lord thy God, that I am come into the country which the Lord sware unto our fathers for to give us.] This is a thankful acknowledgment of God's faithfulness to his promise, whereby they were put in mind to be faithful unto him, of whom they held this good land, by his gracious and free gift, and held it by this tenure, of paying to him this yearly rent.

Ver. 4. And the priest shall take the basket out of thy hand, and set it before the altar of the Lord thy God.] After the foregoing words were said, the basket was taken down from their shoulders, and every one holding his basket by the handle, or the rim of it, the priest put his hands under it, and waved it about, according to the prescription in the law, while the men recited the following words, ver. 5, 6, &c. This waving was a manifest token that it was offered to the Lord of the world, as an acknowledgment that he was in a peculiar manner their Lord and Sovereign, of whom they held this land.

Ver. 5. And thou shalt speak and say before the Lord thy God.] Audibly pronounce in the presence of God.

A Syrian ready to perish was my father.] Their father Jacob was not a Syrian by birth, for he was born in the land of Canaan. But one and the same person may be said to be of divers countries (as Bochartus hath observed), with regard either to the place of his nativity, or of his education, or of his life and conversation; which occasioned three countries to be ascribed to our blessed Saviour, viz. Bethlehem, Nazareth, and Capernaum. (See his Phaleg. lib. ii. cap. 5.) Thus Jacob, who was born and bred in Canaan, is notwithstanding called a Syrian, because he lived twenty years with his uncle Laban, who was a Syrian, (Gen. xxv. 20.) and consequently Jacob's mother was so, as were both his wives, and all his children, who were born there, except Benjamin. But he is more particularly here called a Syrian, to put them in mind of his poverty, when he went first into that country, and there lived as a servant, under a hard master; which is expressed in these words, ready to perish, that is, very poor, and reduced to great straits, being forced to flee from the fury of his brother Esau, and to travel on foot to Padan-Aram, (which was comprehended anciently under the name of Syria, Gen. xxxii. 10.) where he was so cruelly used by his uncle Laban, (xxxi. 7. 39—41.) that Onkelos takes these words, which we translate ready to perish, in an active sense, for him that destroys another. For by the Syrian here he understands Laban, (who is so called, as I noted before, Gen. xxviii. 5.) as if the meaning were, the Syrian (that is, Laban) sought to destroy my father. For, as he used him barbarously when he was with him, so he followed after him, when he went away, with a mind to ruin him. And thus Manasseh ben Israel understands it, and many others mentioned by Fesselius, which is the sense also of the Vulgar Latin, Syrus persequebatur patrem meum.

And he went down into Egypt.] Though he brought him from Laban with great substance, yet as he was still but a sojourner in the land of Canaan, so he was forced by famine to go down into Egypt for sustenance.

And sojourned there with a few.] They were but seventy persons, and lived there as strangers. All which they were now bound to commemorate, for their humiliation before God (which I observed before out of Maimonides), which might move them the more to exalt and magnify the mercy of God to them, who had made them (as it follows) a mighty nation. For this confession consists of these two parts; their own unworthiness, and God's great goodness.

And became there a nation, great, mighty, and populous.] See Exod. i. 7.

Ver. 6. And the Egyptians evil-entreated us, and afflicted us, and laid upon us hard bondage.] The goodness of God unto them in making them so numerous, was the occasion of sorer affliction, than either they or their fathers had endured. (See Exod. i. 9, 10, &c.) The remembrance of this was exceeding useful, to stir up their gratitude to God, not only for their deliverance from the Egyptian slavery, but bringing them into a country of their own, most plentifully stored with all manner of good things.

Ver. 7. And when we cried unto the Lord God of our fathers, the Lord heard our voice, and looked upon our affliction, &c.] Having acknowledged their low, and poor, and distressed condition, now they proceed to an acknowledgment of God's wonderful goodness; which appeared the more in relieving them when they were utterly helpless. (See Exod. ii. 23—25. iii. 7, 8.)

Ver. 8. And the Lord brought us forth out of Egypt, with a mighty hand, and with a stretched-out arm, and a great terribleness, &c.] See iv. 34. and vii. 19. This is so vehemently inculcated upon them (as Maimonides speaks in the place forenamed), that they should remember the day they came out of Egypt all the days of their life, xvi. 3. Exod. x. 2. Which it became them especially to remember at this time, that they might demonstrate the truth of prophecy both concerning punishments and rewards.

Ver. 9. And hath brought us into this place, and given us this land, even a land flowing with milk and honey.] As they remember the terrible plagues upon Egypt in the foregoing verse, so they commemorate the singular blessings bestowed upon them in this.

Ver. 10. And now, behold, I have brought the first-fruits of the land, which thou, O Lord, hast given me.] Thus they concluded this solemn rite, as they began it, (ver. 3.) with an acknowledgment that they held this land of God as the supreme Lord, and that by his free gift.

And thou shalt set it before the Lord thy God.] Having said these words, they left the basket by the altar, as the Jews say, where it had been placed, (ver. 4.) and then the priest set it before the sanctuary, where God dwelt by his special presence there.

And worship before the Lord thy God.] They made a profound reverence towards the holy place, by bowing their bodies as low as they could, and so went out of the temple: so the Hebrew word imports. And this outward act of worship, no doubt, was accompanied, in all good men, with humble thanks to God for his benefits, and prayer for the continuance of them.

Ver. 11. And thou shalt rejoice in every thing which the Lord thy God hath given unto thee, and unto thy house; thou, and the Levite, and the stranger that is among you.] They were to make a feast at the time of offering these first-fruits; and there to entertain the Levites, and the strangers, as well as their own family. These feasts were made out of the provision mentioned, xii. 6, 7. xvi. 10—12. Besides which, the bullock, which went before them when they carried up the first-fruits from their several cities, was offered for a peace-offering, when they came to the sanctuary; as Mr. Selden observes in the place abovementioned, (lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 13. p. 203.)

Ver. 12. When thou hast made an end of tithing all the tithes of thine increase.] For there was a second tithe to be paid after the first to the Levites, as was observed above, xii. 6. and is plainly spoken of, xiv. 22, 23, &c. Which the Jews call the consummation or finishing of tithing, as I observed there, ver. 29. And so these words may be translated, When thou hast finished all the tithes of thine increase.

The third year, which is the year of tithing.] Every third year, the second tithe beforementioned was to be employed to a peculiar use, (see xix. 28, 29.) as it follows here in the next words. (So the Jews expound it, whose sense our Mr. Mede expresses in a few words.) For two years together they paid the Levites' tithe, and the festival tithe; but in the third year they paid the Levites' tithe, and the poor man's tithe; that is, what was wont in other years to be spent in feasting, was wholly spent every third year upon the poor. (Book i. Discourse xxxii. p. 228.) But there are some that think they were bound every third year to pay this poor man's tithe, besides that to the Levites' and the festival tithe: about which I shall not here dispute.

And hast given it to the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow, that they may eat within thy gates, and be filled.] According to the commandment, xiv. 29. (See there.)

Ver. 13. Then thou shalt say.] As they were every year to make the foregoing profession when they brought their first-fruits, so they were to make another profession, which here follows, every third year: "When the course of all manner of tithing (as Mr. Mede there expresses it) was come about."

Before the Lord.] This sounds as if they were to make this profession before the most holy place at the sanctuary. Which seems to confute the common exposition of the Jewish doctors, that this tithe of the third year was not to be spent there, but at home, within their own gates. But it may be supposed, that every man was privately to make this solemn profession, as in the presence of God, who knew the truth of what he said. Or rather, that the next time he went up to worship at God's house, he was bound to make this declaration before the Divine Majesty. Which is the most likely interpretation, because these words, before the Lord, are always so used in these books. And unless they had been obliged to this, their covetous and cruel disposition might have inclined them to defraud the poor, which by this means was prevented. For though men might have satisfied themselves in omitting this profession, if it had been left merely to their own private consciences, yet when they were bound to come and make it publicly at God's own house, as they could not avoid it, so few would be found so impudently profane, as solemnly to tell a lie to God himself.

I have brought away the hallowed things.] Things separated by the Divine commandment from their own private use, for the use of the poor.

Out of my house.] From the rest of the fruits of the earth which they had gathered.

And also I have given them unto the Levite, and unto the stranger, to the fatherless, and to the widow.] That is, unto the refreshment of the poor. So the Jerusalem Targum paraphrases ver. 2. which is worth the mentioning: "In the third year, which is the year of tithing for the poor, ye shall give the first tithes to the Levites, and then the tithes of the poor to the strangers, fatherless, and widows, that they may eat in their cities, and be filled."

According to all thy commandments which thou hast commanded me.] According to the direction beforementioned, xiv. 29.

I have not transgressed thy commandments, neither have I forgotten them.] Neither done contrary to God's precepts, nor forgotten to perform them; either by keeping these tithes to themselves, or by bestowing them otherwise than God appointed.

Ver. 14. I have not eaten thereof in my mourning.] After the general profession, mentioned in the verse foregoing, that they had brought all hallowed things out of their houses, and employed them as God directed, they were to make three particular professions, which are mentioned in this verse. And, it is probable, they have respect to some idolatrous customs which were in those days: the first of them is, that they had not eaten thereof in mourning, or in lamentation. For so the Hebrew word oni signifies, very bitter grief, and sore mourning. Such the Egyptians made in harvest-time, when they offered the first-fruits of the earth, and kept the feast of Isis with doleful lamentations. So Diodorus Siculus, and other authors, tell us, particularly Julius Firmicus, who severely reproves their folly, or madness rather, saying, Cur plangitis fruges terræ, &c. "Why do you bewail the fruits of the earth? Why weep you at the growth of your seed? &c. You should rather give thanks for these things to the most high God, whose bounty is not to be lamented; but bewail rather your own error," &c. If there was such a custom in the world, when Moses lived, it may very well be thought that he taught the Israelites to disclaim such senseless and impious practices. And as the Egyptians, by this mourning, acknowledged Isis, that is, the earth, to be the giver of all these good things; so he required God's people to bring in their harvest with the greatest joy and thanks unto the Most High: for there was no joy so great as that of harvest and vintage; directly opposite to the heathen, who kept the feast of Bacchus also with lamentations. (See our learned Dr. Spencer, lib. ii. de Ritual. Hebr. Leg. cap. 24. sect. 1.)

Nor taken aught thereof for any unclean use.] As some of the old idolaters were wont to do; who separated some part of the first-fruits for magical purposes, and sometimes for carnal and filthy. So Julius Firmicus informs us, who immediately after the mention of their lamentations, when they gathered the fruits of the earth, asks this question, "Quid addis incestum et adulterium?" Which shews that there were unclean rites which accompanied their offerings; and that they made them minister unto Venus. See the same learned author in the same place, sect. 3.

Nor given aught thereof for the dead.] If this be the right translation of the last words, for the dead, St. Austin hath given us a likely reason of this clause, which was, to profess they had not imitated the gentiles, who were wont to set meat and drink upon the graves of the dead, as he tells us, Serm. 15. de Sanctis. But it doth not appear that they set any part of their tithe, or first-fruits upon them, nor that they did it only in harvest-time; but rather common bread and wine, which at all times they set upon their graves when they were interred: and therefore it may be translated to the dead, (as the same excellent person observes, sect. 3.) And so it is a profession, they had not offered any of the fruits of the earth to heroes (after the manner of the gentiles), particularly to Osiris. For that they honoured them with their first-fruits, appears by a passage in Porphyry, lib. iv. περὶ Ἀποχῆς, sect. 22. where he mentions three laws made by Triptolemus, an ancient lawgiver among the Athenians: one of which is this, Θεοὺς καρποῖς ἀγάλλειν, To worship the gods with the fruits of the earth. Which Draco thus expounds, as he shews in the conclusion of that book; Θεοὺς τιμᾶν καὶ ἡρῶας ἐγχωρίους ἐν κοινῷ ἑπομένους νόμοις πατρίοις ἰδίᾳ κατὰ δύναμιν σὺν εὐφημίᾳ καὶ ἀπαρχαῖς καρπῶν, &c. To honour the gods, and the heroes of their country publicly, according to the laws of the nation; and privately, as much as they were able, with speaking well of them, and with the first-fruits, and the annual offerings. (See Meursius, in his Themis Attica, lib. i. cap. 1.) But however we take this, the giving any part of tithe, either for the dead, or to the dead, shews there was such a superstitious custom: unto which this clause having a manifest respect, we have reason to think the two former have so likewise.

But I have hearkened to the voice of the Lord my God, and done according to all that thou hast commanded me.] Performed all that God required, and done nothing contrary to it. All these words from ver. 13. to this place, were to be spoken with a low and humble voice, because they are a sort of commendation of themselves, and of their own integrity; which is not to be proclaimed aloud. But when they made the foregoing profession, at the presenting of their first-fruits, (ver. 5, 6, &c.) they being an acknowledgment of their own meanness and poor beginnings, and of God's infinite goodness in their advancement, they were to lift up their voice, and say aloud, My father was a Syrian ready to perish, &c. Thus the doctors resolve in the Gemara of Mischna Sota, cap. 7. in the beginning of it.

Ver. 15. Look down.] Have a gracious regard.

From thy holy habitation from heaven.] This is an humble acknowledgment of the infinite majesty of God, who, though he was graciously pleased to dwell among them by a glorious symbol of his presence in the sanctuary, yet dwelt in a far more transcendant glory in the heavens, the highest of which could not contain him, as holy men acknowledged, (1 Kings viii. 27. 2 Chron. ii. 6.)

And bless thy people Israel, and the land which thou hast given us.] Having performed their duty, they had the greater confidence to beg the continuance of God's mercies to them, and to their country; which it had been presumption to expect, if they had not acknowledged him to be the donor of all the good things they enjoyed in the manner before appointed. For this was the end of all oblations, both of this tithe, and of the first-fruits, and any other, to acknowledge God to be the Lord, of whom all things come (as David speaks), and of whose own we give unto him. (See 1 Chron. xxix. 11—13, &c.)

As thou swarest unto our fathers.] He teacheth them to conclude as they began, (ver. 3.) with a thankful acknowledgment of God's faithfulness to his promise.

A land that floweth with milk and honey.] See xi. 9. The Jerusalem Targum paraphraseth it thus, A land producing fruits as pure as milk, and as sweet and delicious as honey.

Ver. 16. This day.] This refers to the time when Moses spake all these words unto them.

The Lord thy God commanded thee.] By me.

To do these statutes and judgments.] These two words comprehend the precepts in the foregoing chapters: some of which concern matters of religion, and others of civil government.

Thou shalt therefore keep and do them, with all thine heart, and with all thy soul.] Set yourselves sincerely and heartily to the performance of them.

Ver. 17. Thou hast avouched.] So the Hebrew word signifies, as Job Ludolphus observes, who renders it, asseverare, serio affirmare; being the same with the French word avouer, and may be here translated, thou hast solemnly professed, or rather protested.

The Lord this day.] The word this is not in the Hebrew (as it is in the foregoing verse), but he saith simply hajom (not hajom hazeth), the day, or that day; which signifies the time when Moses delivered these laws from God.

To be thy God.] Then they owned him to be their king and governor. For so the name Elohim properly signifies dignity, empire, and authority, as Grotius observes upon Exod. xx. Fortunatus Scacchus, before him, expounds these very words: "Which (saith he) have respect to God as their emperor, who had the supreme government of the commonwealth of Israel, with a right and authority of constituting laws, and giving mandates for the establishing of that government." Sacror. Elæochrysm. par. ii. cap. 52. p. 509. (See Exod. xxiv. 3, 4, &c. and xxxiv. 27.)

And to walk in his ways.] By his ways, that author understands the moral precepts written on tables of stone.

To keep his statutes.] The ritual precepts.

And his commandments.] Concerning the duties of his worship and service.

And his judgments.] The political precepts belonging to their good government.

And to hearken unto his voice.] In all things which he should declare from his oracle, when they consulted it.

Ver. 18. And the Lord hath avouched thee this day to be his peculiar people, &c.] At the same time (for the word this is not in the Hebrew), the Lord assured the Israelites that they should be his people, in a special manner, provided they made good their promise of keeping his commandments: for the covenant was mutual. (See Exod. xxiv. 3. 7. xix. 5, 6.) It is observable that the Jerusalem Targum paraphrases these two verses in this manner: "Ye have taken the Word of the Lord to reign over you to-day, that he may be your God, &c. And the Word of the Lord reigneth over you, a people dedicated to his name, as his peculiar," &c. Where Memra, the Word, cannot be understood otherwise than of the second Person in the Deity.

Ver. 19. And to make thee high above all nations that he hath made.] It is a pious note of Conr. Pellicanus, that there is no greater glory to the faithful, than that they are peculiarly grateful, devoted, dedicated, obedient unto God, as his children.

In praise, and in name, and in honour.] These words express his singular kindness to them, in that though all nations were his (being made by him, and he the Lord and governor of them all), yet he promised to have such a special favour to them, that all nations round them should take notice of it, and speak with admiration of their happiness, and the honour he had done them. All this is included in those words beforementioned, Exod. xix. 5, 6. where the last words of this verse are explained, That thou mayest be a holy people unto the Lord thy God, as he hath spoken.

All this Moses called to their mind, that it might prepare and dispose them to renew the same covenant with God, before he left them; which he presses upon them in the nine-and-twentieth chapter of this book, after he had given them some other admonitions, and laid before them the blessings and curses that would come upon them, according to their fidelity or falseness in that holy covenant. Which is the subject of the two following chapters.

CHAP. XXVII.

Ver. 1. AND Moses, with the elders of Israel commanded the people, saying.] I observed in the preface to this book, and upon chap. iv. 41. and other places, that Moses did not speak all that is contained in this book at once, but at several times; and that he commonly took the elders to his assistance, as is here expressly affirmed; though some things he spake himself alone to all the people, as I observed upon ver. 1.

Keep all the commandments which I command you.] This is a new exhortation to obedience; which he could not press too often, considering the great proneness of this people to break God's laws.

This day.] At this time, and formerly: for it doth not precisely signify one day; and the word this is not in the original.

Ver. 2. And it shall come to pass, on the day when ye shall pass over Jordan.] Here it is evident the word day doth not signify precisely the very same day they passed over, but not long after, as soon as they were come to Mount Ebal, (ver. 4.) after the taking of Jericho and Ai, as appears from Josh. viii. 30. For they were to pass over Jordan, unto the land which the Lord their God gave them (as it here follows), before they were obliged to do what is here required.

That thou shalt set thee up great stones.] It is not said how many; but some fancy there were twelve, according to the number of pillars which Moses employed (Exod. xxiv. 4.) when he made the covenant between God and his people. But, unless we could certainly determine how much of the law was to be written upon these stones, we cannot give a good guess at their number. For if only the ten commandments, fewer than twelve would serve; if the whole book of Deuteronomy, so many are not sufficient. As for the marginal reference in our Bibles unto Josh. iv. 1. it can have no respect to this place; for those twelve stones were ordered to be taken out of Jordan, and left there, where they lodged that night, which was at Gilgal. (See there, ver. 3. 8. 20.)

And plaster them with plaster.] That being plain and smooth, they might write what is here commanded upon them, which they could not do while they were rough and uneven.

Ver. 3. And thou shalt write upon them all the words of this law.] Many think he means the whole book of Deuteronomy; which, because it is long, great stones are ordered to be provided for this purpose. Others think only the ten commandments are here intended, which were the principal words of the covenant, as Moses calls this law, xxxix. 1. But Josephus (lib. iv. Archæol. cap. ult.) is of opinion, that he means the cursings which here follow from verse 15. to the end of the chapter. Which is no improbable opinion; they containing several select precepts, and the last of them seems to respect the whole law of Moses, ver. 26.

But, however we understand this, it is certain, that, before the use of paper was found out, the ancients, particularly the Phœnicians and Egyptians, were wont to write their minds upon stones, as a great many authors testify, mentioned by Huetius, who observes, that this custom continued long after the invention of paper, especially if they desired any thing should be vulgarly known and conveyed down to posterity. See Demonstr. Evang. propos. iv. cap. 2. n. 15. where he observes, that Moses ordered the book of Deuteronomy to be inscribed upon stones. I suppose he means all the laws contained in this book (not all the exhortations and historical passages), which agrees very well with this injunction, that they should write on the stones all the words of this law.

When thou art passed over, that thou mayest go in unto the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, &c.] When they were gone over Jordan to take possession of the land of Canaan, and were come to the place where he directed these stones to be set up, and this inscription made upon them. Which place is particularly named in the next verse. And from these words Fortunatus Scacchus thinks he hath reason to assert, that none of the things forementioned are meant by the words of this law, here commanded to be written; but that upon the very top of these stones (or the altar made of them, as he would have it understood) were written only the words of this covenant, whereby the people of Israel confessed themselves to have received the land of Canaan from God, and to hold it on condition of their obedience unto him. For so he interprets the words write unto them, in summa superficie. And to make us know what he means by the words of this law, he thinks the following words are added, that thou mayest go in unto the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, &c. that is, thou shalt declare who brought thee hither, and gave thee possession of this country, and upon what condition; viz. that thou shouldest keep the commands given to thee by God in Horeb. And therefore Moses doth not bid them write on the stones the law of the Lord nor the law absolutely, but the words of this law. Where the demonstrative particle hazoth limits the sense to the present matter of which he is speaking. Thus he, Myrothec. 2. Sacror. Elæochrysm, cap. 57. where he endeavours to strengthen this interpretation, by observing, that, after this command for writing this law upon the stones, "Moses, and the priests, and Levites, spake unto all Israel, saying, Take heed, and hearken, O Israel, this day thou art become the people of the Lord thy God," &c. (ver. 9, 10.)

Ver. 4. Therefore it shall be, when ye be gone over Jordan, that ye shall set up these stones.] This phrase, set up, seems to imply that they were a kind of pillars erected for this purpose, that the inscription might appear more fairly upon them.

In Mount Ebal.] Here the Samaritan Pentateuch hath, in Mount Gerizim; which is a manifest corruption, to justify their building a temple there, which they pretend God commanded in these words.

Ver. 5. And there shalt thou build an altar unto the Lord thy God.] That they might offer sacrifice to God, and renew their covenant with him.

An altar of stones.] Upon which Josephus himself fancies the forenamed inscription was to be made; and so the Talmudists also, in Mischna Sota, cap. 7. But it is plain, the stones designed for that use were to be set up before the altar was built; the intention of it being (as I shall shew presently), that they might promise to observe the words which were there written.

Thou shalt not lift up any iron tool upon them.] See Exod. xx. 25.

Ver. 6. Thou shalt build the altar of the Lord thy God of whole stones.] Not hewn, nor polished; whereby all manner of imagery was avoided. Such rustic altars of rough stone, piled one upon another, were in use among the heathen, who seem to have imitated this pattern. The form of one of them Fortunatus Scacchus hath given us out of some ancient monuments at Brixia, related by Octavius Roscius. (See his forenamed book, cap. 59. p. 585.) Such altars the Israelites were permitted to build upon some special occasion, as Gideon and Manoah did, (Judg. vi. 24. 26. xiii. 19.) and Samuel, (1 Sam. vii. 17.) and Saul, (1 Sam. xiv. 35.) and David: (2 Sam. xxiv. 25.) and such an one Moses himself built, (Exod. xxiv. 4.) And as Moses there set up twelve pillars, according to the number of the tribes of Israel, when they entered into covenant with God at Horeb, so the forementioned author thinks, at the confirmation of it, when they came into Canaan, they built not twelve altars, but heaped up twelve stones, which made one altar, without any cost at all bestowed upon it. And thus Elijah took twelve stones, and on a sudden built an altar with them, when he endeavoured to bring the Israelites back again into the covenant of God, (1 Kings xviii. 31, 32.)

And thou shalt offer burnt-offerings thereon.] As they did at Horeb, (Exod. xxiv. 5.) and as Joshua did when they came into Canaan, and had built the altar here commanded, (Josh. viii. 31.) which burnt-offerings were an acknowledgment of God's sovereign dominion over them; and that they held this land of him, as their supreme Lord, from whom they had received it. They kept the Passover as soon as they came into Canaan; but we read of no altar erected, nor burnt-sacrifices offered, till they came to Ebal.

Ver. 7. And thou shalt offer peace-offerings.] So Moses also did at Horeb, as we read in the forenamed place, (Exod. xxiv. 5.) and so Joshua did when they came into Canaan. And they were offered as thanksgivings to God, for bringing them into that good land.

And shalt eat there, and rejoice before the Lord thy God.] The sacrificers had a part of the peace-offerings given them, that they might feast with God, in token that they were in covenant with him. (See Lev. vii. 5.) And therefore God ordered these sacrifices to be offered, as soon as they came to this place, where his law was to be inscribed upon the stones beforementioned; that the people of Israel, to whom God promised the possession of the land of Canaan, upon the condition that they observed his laws, might confirm their covenant with him, when they took possession of it; and be given to understand, that God, having performed what he promised, expected that they should be mindful of their obligation, faithfully to observe his Divine laws. So that this altar may be properly called (as the same Fort. Scacchus terms it), "the altar of confederation, or confirmation of the covenant, into which they had entered at Horeb."

Ver. 8. And thou shalt write upon the stones all the words of this law very plainly.] So that they might be read easily. How the Talmudists came to fancy they were written in seventy languages, I cannot imagine: but such a conceit there is among them, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 9. p. 396. for so many languages they think there were in the world. And Bartenora saith, God would have every body that came into their country learn these truths, if he pleased; and no pagan be able to excuse his ignorance, by saying, He had no means to know them. (See Joh. Wagenseil upon Sota, cap. 7. sect. 5. annot. 5.)

Ver. 9. And Moses, and the priests, and the Levites, spake unto all Israel, saying.] It seems, by this, that Moses and the elders (ver. 1.) took the priests and Levites to their assistance, to deliver what follows.

Take heed.] Attend to what we say. The Hebrew word is found no where else; and seems to belong to their outward posture.

And hearken.] So as to consider.

This day thou art become the people of the Lord thy God.] These words following after the precept concerning building an altar of confederation, must be understood as relating unto that; and therefore the word this day doth not respect only that particular day on which Moses spake this to the people, or the day wherein God declared it, but the day upon which such an altar, for the renovation of the covenant, was to be erected, when Joshua was to speak these words: for then, and not before, the blessings were pronounced to those that observed the laws of God, and the curses against those that broke them; and God had not fulfilled his promises to them till they came over Jordan. Therefore he did not order this altar to be built, and these sacrifices to be offered, whereby they obliged themselves to him, and became his people by a new bond, till their entrance upon the possession of what he had promised.

Ver. 10. Thou shalt therefore obey the voice of the Lord thy God, and do his commandments, &c.] These words, and the foregoing, are plainly words of a mutual covenant between God and them. Into which covenant they entered three times: first, at Horeb, (Exod. xxiv.) and then just before Moses died, twenty-ninth of this book, (ver. 1. 12, 13, &c.) and when they were come into Canaan, (Josh. viii. 30, 31, &c.) And because the Divine laws delivered to them were confirmed and ratified at all these times, therefore it is that those laws are so frequently called by the name of the covenant; and when they transgressed them, they are said to break this covenant.

Ver. 11. And Moses charged the people the same day, saying.] Which charge, I suppose, the elders, with the assistance of the priests and Levites, delivered throughout the whole camp of Israel, (ver. 1. 9.)

Ver. 12. These shall stand upon Mount Gerizim.] This is a mountain upon which Samaria was afterward built.

To bless the people.] By saying Amen, when they heard the blessings read by the priests. For it was not the people who stood upon the mountain that blessed (i. e. pronounced the blessings), but the priests below, (ver. 14.)

When ye are gone over Jordan.] See ver. 2.

Simeon, and Levi, and Judah, and Issachar, and Joseph, and Benjamin.] These six tribes, who stood upon Mount Gerizim (i. e. upon the top, and on the descent of it down to the bottom), were all descended from the sons of free women, Leah and Rachel; and therefore many think appointed to bless, which was more honourable than to curse.

Ver. 13. And these shall stand upon Mount Ebal to curse.] This was a mountain opposite to the other; and there lay a valley between them. Abimelech seems to have been made king upon this mountain, when he had killed all the sons of Gideon but Jotham: for it was done in the plain (or by the oak) of the pillar, which was in Shechem; that is, by this pillar, on which the curses of the law were written, (Judg. ix. 6.) whereupon Jotham got upon Mount Gerizim, and then cursed the men of Shechem. Which shews, that the tops of these mountains were not so far distant one from another, but what was said upon the one might be heard by those who were on the top and the sides of the other. And yet there was such a valley between them, that they could not presently come at Jotham to apprehend him, but he had time to flee, and get away, after he had spoken his apologue.

Reuben, Gad, and Asher, and Zebulun, Dan, and Naphtali.] Four of these were children of the handmaids: and Reuben had lost his dignity by going up to his father's bed; and Zebulun was the youngest of Leah's sons; who was therefore chosen, rather than any of the other, for this less honourable employment. For otherwise there would not have been an equal number of tribes upon each mountain.

Ver. 14. And the Levites.] That is, the priests, who are often called the priests the Levites; particularly in that very place, where we read of the execution of this command, Josh. viii. 33. And the Levites were among those that stood upon Mount Gerizim, (ver. 12.) who did not pronounce the blessings, but answered Amen to them. Yet the Gemara upon Sota, cap. 7. sect. 23. will have it, that as many of the Levites as were fit to minister (that is, all from thirty to fifty years of age, who were fit to carry the ark) stood round about the ark with the priests; the rest of the Levites being upon Mount Gerizim, with the other tribes appointed to have their station there.

Shall speak, and say unto all the men of Israel.] The same Gemara rightly gathers, that the ark with the priests were below in the valley between the two mountains; because it is said, in the place beforementioned, that all Israel and the elders stood about it, Josh. viii. 33. Which could not have been, unless it were placed between the two mountains whereon they stood, upon both sides, from the top to the bottom.

With a loud voice.] That every one that stood on the side or top of the mountains might hear what they said, the priests being placed so, in several parts of the valley, that their voice might reach them all. For which end they were advanced, perhaps, upon a pulpit, (as Ezra afterward was, Neh. viii. 4.) and a signal likewise given when they should say Amen.

Ver. 15. Cursed be he that maketh any graven or molten image.] The people upon the mountains being to bless as well as curse, the Mischna, in the title Sota, (cap. 7. sect. 5.) rightly explains this; that, first, the priests, turning their faces towards Mount Gerizim, proclaimed with a loud voice, Blessed be the man that maketh not any graven, &c. unto which all the people that stood there answered Amen; and then turning their faces towards Mount Ebal, they said these words, Cursed be the man that maketh, &c. to which they that stood there made the same answer. See also the Jerusalem Targum, which paraphrases these words in the same manner.

An abomination unto the Lord.] Which is odious, and far to be removed from the presence of the Lord, as the same Targum interprets it.

The work of the hands of the craftsman.] A mere device of men, and therefore not to have Divine worship given to it of any sort.

And putteth it in a secret place.] Though he was not a public declared worshipper of images, yet, if he did it privately, in some closet of his own house, or in any other secret place, to conceal his wickedness, though he escaped the punishment of the law, which sentenced open idolaters to death, yet he could not escape the vengeance of God.

And all the people.] The forenamed Mischna and Targum say, that the people on both mountains answered Amen, both to the blessings and to the cursings; which doth not agree with what goes before, ver. 12, 13.

Shall answer and say, Amen.] Express their consent to it. For the word Amen, as the Talmudists say in Schebuoth, hath sometimes the force of an oath, sometimes only declares consent and approbation, and sometimes is used for the confirmation of any thing. An example of the first they think there is in Numb. v. 22. and they allege this place for an example of the second; and for the third, Jer. xxviii. 6.

Ver. 16. Cursed be he that setteth light by his father and mother.] It is observed by interpreters, that, as the precept of honouring parents stands next to the commandment concerning the honour that is due to God, (Exod. xx. 12.) so the curse pronounced against those who dishonoured them, is here placed next to the curse against worshippers of images. And as idolaters were to be put to death, so were those that cursed their parents, (Exod. xxi. 17. Lev. xx. 9.) And I may add, from the foregoing words, that though they did it ever so secretly, they lay under this curse.

And all the people shall say, Amen.] But before this curse was pronounced, they had said Amen to the blessing opposite to it [Blessed is he that setteth not lightly by his father and mother], as was observed in the foregoing verse. And the same is to be noted concerning the following curses, which were preceded with a blessing, till they were all ended.

Ver. 17. Cursed be he that removeth his neighbour's landmark, &c.] Against which there is an express precept in the foregoing part of this book, xix. 14. And Pellicanus well observes, that, by this particular instance of God's displeasure against injustice, they were deterred from all encroachments upon their neighbours' possessions.

Ver. 18. Cursed be he that maketh the blind to wander out of the way.] By giving him wrong directions, or misleading him. (See Lev. xix. 14.) Some apply this to giving pernicious advice to simple people; which is certainly worse than misguiding of the blind, because it leads men into sin, as well as into danger.

Ver. 19. Cursed be he that perverteth the judgment of the stranger, fatherless, and widow.] These three I observed before (xxiv. 19.) are commonly put together, as a paraphrase on the word poor: whose cause God himself undertakes to plead, (x. 18. and see Exod. xii. 21, 22.) And, therefore, all good lawgivers have taken special care of them, particularly of orphans; concerning whom Plato ordains, that the conservators of the laws should be ἀντὶ γενητόρων, instead of their natural parents, and look after them so well, that they should not fare the worse for wanting their fathers. (See lib. viii. de Legibus, fol. 926, &c. edit. Serrani.)

Ver. 20. Cursed be he that lieth with his father's wife.] See xxii. 30. and Lev. xviii. 8.

Ver. 21. Cursed be he who lieth with any manner of beast, &c.] Exod. xxii. 19. and Lev. xviii. 23. This some of the Jewish doctors, out of an unaccountable pride, apply to the vulgar sort of their own nation (whom they call the people of the earth), as if they were no better than beasts, with whom they were not to marry.

Ver. 22. Cursed be he that lieth with his sister, the daughter of his father, or the daughter of his mother, &c.] This hath been explained also, Lev. xviii. 9.

Ver. 23. Cursed be he that lieth with his mother-in-law, &c.] See Lev. xviii. 17. and xx. 14.

Ver. 24. Cursed be he that smiteth his neighbour secretly, &c.] Though it be but with his tongue, whereby he wounds the fame of an absent person. But the word smite is often used for killing, (Exod. xxi. 12. Lev. xxiv. 17.) Of which, if a man was guilty, though he committed the murder so secretly, that he could not be put to death by the sentence of the judges, yet he lay under this heavy sentence of God.

Ver. 25. Cursed be he that taketh a reward to slay an innocent person, &c.] This seems to have respect to the judges, who for money not only gave wrong judgment in other causes, but condemned those that were not guilty to death. (See Exod. xxiii. 7, 8. and in this book, x. 17. xvi. 19.)

Ver. 26. Cursed be he that confirmeth not all the words of this law to do them.] The word we here translate confirm, is more plainly translated perform, in 1 Sam. xv. 11. And so it certainly signifies here; the performing of what God commands, being a kind of establishment of the law, as disobedience is a subversion of it, and, as far as lies in the offender's power, an abolishing it, and taking it away. Therefore, the apostle exactly translates the sense of these words, Galat. iii. 10. Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things, &c. where the apostle adds the word all (as the LXX. and the Samaritan did, even in St. Jerome's time), to expound the words of this law, to signify not merely all that is contained in these blessings and curses, but all things which are written in the book of the law. So that whether this whole book (i. e. all the laws contained in it) were to be written upon the pillars, or only these blessings and cursings, the matter comes to the same issue; because all that is contained in this book is comprehended in this last curse, yea, all that is contained in the whole law of Moses. Therefore, it is not very material neither, whether only these curses and blessings were recited upon Mount Gerizim and Ebal, or the whole law of Moses, from one end to the other, about which the Jews themselves differ. But they that are of the latter opinion, think it well grounded upon Josh. viii. 33. where we read how Joshua carefully performed what Moses here enjoined. And, that his words might not be forgotten, Moses seems to have ordered the continuance of this solemnity every seventh year, in the twenty-ninth chapter of this book, ver. 10, 11, &c.

The Mischna in Sota (which I have often mentioned), concludes this matter with these words: When the blessings and the cursings were ended, they brought stones and built an altar, which they plastered over, and wrote upon them all the words of this law in seventy languages. But I have shewn before, that the stones on which the law was written were different from the altar, and were erected before the building of the altar. The Gemara there adds, (cap. 7. sect. 24.) That every one of the Israelites there present stood bound one for another (that is, for the whole company), that they would observe these laws. Which I know not how they extract out of Moses's words; but their doctors frequently mention it in their books, and make this pious use of it, that, by virtue of this security which they gave for each other, every man was bound to reprove his neighbour if he saw him offend, unless he was content to undergo the punishment which was threatened unto the breach of God's laws, and come under the curse, (Lev. xix. 17.) And unto this they apply those words, they shall fall one upon another, (as we truly translate, Lev. xxvi. 37.) as if they signified, every one shall fall by his brother, that is, by his brother's crimes: for we all promised, say they, (in the Gemara Sanhedrin, cap. 3. sect. 6.) and engaged one for another; and so from that time were punished one for another.
